When I was last in Germany on assignment two years ago, I tried to contact Ingo Hasselbach. My efforts were in vain. Hasselbach, a neo-Nazi who had defected from the movement in a blaze of publicity, was said to be in hiding. Little did I know that he and an American journalist, Tom Reiss, the son of a Holocaust survivor, were at that very moment collaborating on a book.

It has now been published under the title of Fuhrer-Ex: Memoirs of a Former Neo-Nazi (Random House, $33.50). The latest in a stream of volumes about neo-Nazism which have hit the market since the reunification of Germany in 1990, Fuhrer-Ex is a well-written, fascinating story of a man who was almost spiritually and physically destroyed by a hateful creed.

To the best of my knowledge, it is the first insider's account of the German neo-Nazi movement, which has shocked the civilized world with its rhetoric and violence.

By any yardstick, Hasselbach, 29, was a picture-perfect Aryan: tall, blond and xeonophobic, a stereotypical racist-cum-brawler who headed the National Alternative, one of the first neo-Nazi political parties in Germany.

Hasselbach was not only a budding ideologue. He was a common street fighter who revelled in bruising battles with anarchists. He was a terrorist who plotted the assassination of Gregor Gysi, the reformed Communist party leader, and of Ignatz Bubis, the president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. He was the organizer of paramilitary camps for neo-Nazis who fought on Croatia's side in the Yugoslavian civil war. And lest we forget, he was the desecrator of the grave of Rosa Luxemburg, the Jewish revolutionary.

One wonders, then, why such a person, someone whom Hitler, Goebbels or Streicher would doubtless have admired as an exemplar of patriotic youth, gave it all up in a public display of contrition and repentance.

Hasselbach's road to sanity was long and tortured, and for a neo-Nazi, he sprang from the unlikeliest of backgrounds. He was born out of wedlock in the now-defunct German Democratic Republic (East Germany), where his father, an ardent Communist, rose to be chief of the official state radio.

Hasselbach was not the apple of his father's eye. Indeed, he was a great embarrassment: a hippy, a hard-core punk, a drunk. Apart from being an incorrigible rebel in a state which demanded conformity, he was prone to violence.

When he was still a teenager, he spraypainted swastikas on buildings in his neighborhood. It was purely an act of defiance, Hasselbach having little idea what the symbol denoted.

In 1987, he was detained by the authorities for shouting, "The (Berlin) wall must fall!" He was packed off to jail for one year. In the next two years, he flitted from one prison to another, charged with insulting a policeman and giving the stiff-arm Nazi salute.

In his cell, Hasselbach acquired the rudiments of Nazism from hardened Nazi war criminals. Primarily, they poisoned his mind with anti-Semitic ravings. Hasselbach had never knowingly met a Jew, nor was he inherently ill-disposed toward Jews, but now, willy nilly, he was launched on the path of anti-Semitism.

With his flight to West Germany two days before the fall of the Berlin Wall in November 1989, Hasselbach enlarged his education as a right-wing radical. In a refugee camp in Hamburg, he met West German neo-Nazis who plied him with propaganda literature which was hard to come by in East Germany. He was also introduced to Michael Kuhnen, the most prominent neo-Nazi leader in West Germany, a cany individual whom he would regard as a father figure.

With Kuhnen's encouragement and help, Hasselbach founded the National Alternative, the first ever neo-Nazi party in East Germany, a professedly anti-fascist state which would soon implode and be swallowed up by West Germany.

Under Kuhnen's guidance, Hasselbach became a confirmed anti-Semite. And with the passage of time, he learned the ways of capitalism, charging reporters a fee for interviews.

As his star rose, Hasselbach frequented the homes of old Nazis. One such salon, in Berlin, was presided over by an elderly woman. Her guests were a jumble of academics, attorneys and doctors who had been fanatical Nazis during the Third Reich. As Hasselbach recalls, they were obsessed by their collective hatred of Jews. One venomous 80-year-old woman, eating cake and dribbling coffee onto her blouse said, "We absolutely should desecrate more Jewish cemeteries this month."

Besides meeting such people, Hasselbach regularly found himself in the company of Gary (Gerhard) Lauck, the American neo-Nazi who cynically mails anti-Semitic materials under false Jewish surnames so as to avoid official detection, and Gottfried Kussel, the Austrian neo-Nazi whom he describes as "the world's greatest anti-Semite."

Hasselbach began to turn his back on the movement when a foreigners' hostel in Rostock was firebombed by neo-Nazis. "I saw violence against them as idiotic and also cowardly." At that stage of his development, he believed that terrorism should be directed against big companies — Opel and Mercedes-Benz — which employed foreigners!

Perhaps the most decisive turning point in Hasselbach's ultimate rejection of neo-Nazism was his unlikely friendship with a left-wing filmmaker named Winfried Bonengel, whose hard-hiting movies, Profession Neo-Nazi and We're Back, received critical acclaim.

We're Back, which stars none other than the blond beast himself, was a cathartic experience for Hasselbach. As he watched it, he was assailed by self-doubts. "My attitudes and goals (seemed) ridiculous, as well as frightening," he confesses.

Torn by uncertainty, and contemplating a new life free of racism, Hasselbach embarked on the path of redemption.

If there was a defining moment of truth, it was the neo-Nazi firebombing of a house in Molln in which two Turkish girls and their grandmother were burned alive. "I felt a certain boundary had been overstepped ... I felt sick." Much to his disgust, his comrades celebrated the tragedy.

As his disillusionment grew, Hasselbach finally realized how absurd were the neo-Nazi claims that the Holocaust was a hoax. At the end of 1993, he decided to quit and to renounce the movement, a decision his former kamerads denounced as an act of treachery and promised to avenge.

By way of retaliation, they sent a powerful, though defective, bomb to his mother's house in Berlin. If it had exploded, the device would have brought down the four-storey building.

Hasselbach was not intimidated. He wrote a book, in German, about his fling with neo-Nazism, and he told the security services everything he knew about the movement. His testimony prompted a nation-wide crackdown on neo-Nazism and still more threats from his former friends.

Today, Hasselbach lectures frequently on right-wing extremism, knowing that his life is still in danger. But he persists, secure in the knowledge that the battle against neo-Nazism is a never-ending task.

Librarian Glassman turns her passion into life's work

Communities cannot function and prosper without the commitment, care and tireless efforts, mostly unrecognized, of countless hard-working individuals. They are the "unsung heroes" of the community. Spotlight will appear occasionally in these pages to shine a light on some of these heroes. If you would like The CJN to cast a spotlight on the unsung heroes you know, please contact Carolyn Blackman at The CJN any Friday before 3 p.m.

TORONTO — One of Zina Glassman's fond memories of her childhood in Russia is of her father filling their home with books.

Now the librarian at Beth Tzedec Synagogue's Max & Beatrice Wolfe Library, Glassman has turned her lifelong passion for books into a career.

"As a student in Russia, I had wanted to study literature, but because it was difficult for a Jew to get into university, I took library studies at Minsk Pedagogical Institute. In the end it was a good decision. Sometimes things in life steer you in a particular direction and it turns out for the best," she says.

Zina Glassman

Glassman, who has worked at the Judaica library since 1987, is responsible for stocking the shelves with books, tapes, magazines and newspapers, as well as running adult education programs and guiding students from the congregational school in their research projects.

Recent adult programs have included a symposium on literature and anti-Semitism and a lecture on modern Jewish writing.

"Our Judaica shelves have thousands of books in English, Hebrew and Yiddish, and separate sections are devoted to our religious legacy, Israel, Zionism, art, philosophy and fiction.

"I spend hours poring over book reviews and periodicals, ensuring that we have the best current publications," Glassman says. "Along with Marjorie Rasky, chair of the library committee, I make sure we order the best reading material available while not overspending. It is a delicate balance. Other libraries have come to see us so that they could model their library after Beth Tzedec's."

Glassman says when she was growing up in Russia, her family retained their Jewish identity and observed most Jewish holidays.

"My grandmother never spoke to us in Russian — it was always Yiddish. Our Jewish bond was strong. This helps immensely with my work in the library. I also keep abreast by a lot of reading and taking courses on Judaic subjects."

A mother of two daughters, she says one of her favorite parts of the job is working with students and helping them develop a love of Judaism.

"Recently, I have begun working on a genealogy project with them so they will have a better knowledge of their roots. The project involves their parents and grandparents, if possible, and they research various topics about their background — meaning of their name, languages spoken, occupations of their ancestors and those who fought, survived or died in the Holocaust. Everybody is really enjoying it."

Glassman also belongs to the Association of Jewish Libraries of America and is on the executive board of the Ontario chapter. A convention to be held in Toronto in June, of which she is one of the organizers, is "a major cultural event for librarians. Its theme is Culture and Community — A Jewish Commitment, and it should give me ideas how to make our library even better."

Kolel to honor Rose Wolfe

By CYNTHIA GASNER

TORONTO — In recognition of her extensive voluntary contributions, Rose Wolfe, chancellor of the University of Toronto, will be honored on April 25.

The tribute dinner at the Inn on the Park is sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, an institute of adult learning in the Greater Toronto Area.

Despite her refusal to accept awards, Wolfe told The CJN she accepted Kolel's tribute because she believes this event will raise the profile of Kolel and attract more people to its educational programs.

"Over the past five years," she says, "I have watched Kolel grow and I am impressed with the programs and participants the institute is attracting. The program is for adults, many of whom are successful in their own fields in business and the professions. Students range from those with little or no Judaic background to those who wish to continue in the field of Jewish studies.

Rose Wolfe

"At a time when there are growing concerns about assimilation and intermarriage, Kolel has emerged as a strengthening and unifying force for the Jewish people."

Her daughter, Elizabeth Wolfe, was a driving force in founding Kolel and is now its chair. On her return to Toronto after a year of study in Israel, Elizabeth realized that it was difficult for her to find a locale for liberal studies.

She worked with Stephen Morrison, the founding chair of Kolel, to establish the institute, which started with 40 students in its first semester and now has an enrolment of 1,500 people. More than 70 percent of the students are between 20 and 45 years of age.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, says Rose Wolfe is an outstanding example of a person totally committed to both educational and Jewish continuity.

"She understands that the best way to reach young Jewish adults on their journey to spiritual and religious discovery is through solid, serious yet accessible and welcoming Jewish educational programming," Rabbi Goldstein said.

"She has spent her life finding a way in both secular and Jewish worlds. We at Kolel are delighted that she has accepted this honor. Her goals and vision are totally in spirit with ours — a deepening of Jewish identity through Jewish education.

Jewish Family & Child Service is grateful to the many supporters of the 1995 Friends Campaign.

The accomplishments of Jewish Family and Child Service are a tribute to our donors whose contributions as Benefactors, "Chai" Friends or Friends have enabled us to provide many worthwhile programs for our community.

Making sacrifices

By
RABBI YAACOV BENAMOU

Parshah Vayikrah starts with an unusual format: "He called to Moses, and HaShem spoke to him from the Tent of Meeting, saying: Speak to the Children of Israel and say to them: When a man among you brings an offering to HaShem."

The theme of this parshah is the korbanot (sacrifices). Throughout generations, the Laws of Korbanot have been discussed extensively. It is interesting to see the viewpoint of the Ramban (Leviticus 1:9) and many others, who emphasize the eternal, intrinsic and sacred values of sacrifices. Our prayers, too, give fervent expression to our hopes that the complete service of the Temple will be restored. It is told that the Chofetz Chaim always had a group of kohanim studying most carefully all laws pertaining to the Avodah in the Temple, in order to be fully prepared at the moment of its restoration.

This much should be clear: The whole system of korbanot was rooted in holiness and its basic aims were of a high and lofty nature. What are some of these aims?

The word korban has great significance, for it has two meanings: to draw near; and to sacrifice.

Life presents us with many serious conflicts. We all recognize the need for drawing near unto G-d, for living by noble ideals and principles. But we often discover that the hard realties of life or the temptation and weakness of human flesh make the realization of these ideals a more difficult task.

The Jew who keeps his Shabbat in spite of economic hardships has learned to bring a korban, a sacrifice, for the sake of his Torah and convictions.

The word oleh, which means a free-will burnt offering, comes from the root "to ascend," for it signifies the desire to ascend towards G-d and place oneself in His service. Likewise the word korban, which means sacrifice or offering, comes from the root "to bring near", for not only is the offering brought near to G-d at the altar, but the spirit of the offering brings one close to G-d.

There is a famous story about the well-known prime minister of England, Sir Benjamin Disraeli. After Disraeli was converted to the dominant faith of England, Queen Victoria said to him: "Mr. Disraeli, I know you to be a wise and brilliant person. It is, therefore, difficult for me to believe that you have abandoned the ancient faith of the Patriarchs and the Prophets for a new faith which owes its very existence to your own religion. I, therefore, have doubts as to whether you really are a full-fledged Christian and likewise as to whether you have really severed completely all of your ties with your own people. Now then, Mr. Disraeli, if you are neither a Jew nor a Christian, may I ask you what you are?"

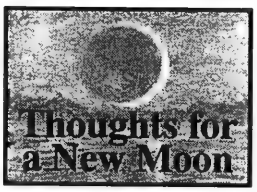
Disraeli bowed politely and replied: "Your Majesty, I am the blank page which separates the Old Testament from the New Testament in the newly published Bible of England." What a brilliant and what a frightfully painful answer!

Fortunately, however, in those days, the number of Disraelis or "blank page Jews" was rather limited. In fact, the Jew was never, whatever else he may have been, blank either in his actions or in his appearance. Can there be any brighter color added to one's life than kiddush and zemirot on a Friday night; a seder with questions and answers presided over by parents; an evening in the sukkah with the stars gazing at you and some of the towering biblical heroes as your guests.?

Judaism pursues this approach. It insists that our ideals have priority, "yikov hadin et hahar" and that we must be prepared to sacrifice and to surrender for the sake of Divine Commandments and inner convictions. Parenthood, liberty and all other virtues can only be achieved through some degree of sacrifice.

Korbanot had to come from a man's own wealth and possessions. One could not bring from hefker (ownerless possessions). This teaches us that we are not to use our wealth only for personal gain and comfort, but devote it also to the service of G-d and man.

Rabbi Benamou is the spiritual leader of Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue in Winnipeg.



Virtues of the matriarchs

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

As we all sit down to our Passover seder, the symbols and images of slavery and redemption overwhelm our senses. Yet at the same time, the subtle tribute being paid to Jewish women of past and present should not be ignored.

From the very first seder in our memories, we notice the repetition of the number four. There are four questions asked by the youngest child; there are four sons addressing their parents; there are four cups of wine that we consume throughout the evening; there are four commandments that outline the minimum of our obligations. The number four weaves itself into the seder ritual and spans the imagery from start to finish. What is the significance of this number and why does it frame our commemoration of redemption?

Throughout the ages, there have been many commentaries and suggestions to solve the puzzle of "the four." But one need not search far and wide for the answer; it appears in the Haggadah itself. The book we read at the seder contains a song toward the end that centres on the question of numbers. Children use this song as a form of quiz to test their knowledge of the numerical symbols of the holiday.

The song begins with "Who knows one? I know one! One is our Lord who is in the heavens and on the earth." It continues through the numbers, listing each number and its parallel significance. Interestingly, when the song lists the question for number four it appears in this way: 'Who knows four? I know four! Four are the matriarchs." Could this be the answer to the repeated appearance of the number four at the seder table?

But what is the significance of the matriarchs at the Passover seder?

The Babylonian Talmud states that the Jewish women enslaved in Egypt modelled themselves on the four matriarchs: Sarah, Rebecca, Leah and Rachel. In fact, according to the Talmud, it is due to the merit of the women enslaved in Egypt that the entire nation of Israel were redeemed.

Yet one wonders how the matriarchs served as models for an entire generation of women, to the point that this alone forced God's intervention for an entire people?

A closer look at these biblical women answers our questions. Embodied in the model of our matriarchs are the virtues to which all Jews strive. Sarah teaches us diplomacy and respect; Rebecca teaches us kindness to all living creatures; Leah shows us the strength necessary to persevere; while Rachel embodies the traits of loyalty and love. Each had good and bad qualities and each strove for what she believed to be true justice.

All of Israel were redeemed because these women were used as models for a generation of women facing cruelty and hardship. Women today are rightfully demanding that the matriarchs be studied and honored. When we encounter the number four in our seders this year, perhaps a moment could be taken to pay tribute to these women — and all women who struggle and strive for greater goals.

Jewish Life

Genre commemorates the dead

Roots & Remembrance

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Out of the ashes of the Holocaust has come a sombre genre of books, known as memorial books or yizkor-bikhur, that attempt to capture the essence of life as it was lived in hundreds of destroyed Jewish communities in Eastern Europe.

In the half-century since the Shoah, more than 600 titles have appeared, chronicling communities large and small, at least 450 of them in Poland. The others deal with an uneven sprinkling of towns in Belarus, Greece, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Ukraine and the former Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. While Lodz, Warsaw, Kalisz, Bialystok and other Polish localities each boast a plurality of volumes, the genre has unfortunately neglected Odessa, Kiev, Zhitomir, Moghilev and many other important eastern communities.

Most yizkor books were compiled after 1945 by groups of survivors belonging to landsmanshaft societies in Israel, the United States, Canada, Argentina and Brazil. They were usually written in a combination of Hebrew and Yiddish, and printed in limited numbers expressly for other survivors and their families. Their purpose was generally to fulfil a deep-felt need to commemorate the dead.

The books generally adhere to an established format. The typical volume contains a historical sketch of the community, usually in a chapter about the town's pre-WWI days. There follows a chapter on the interwar period, featuring personal reminiscences and rich descriptions of communal and educational institutions, social and religious life, and prominent personalities from the revered rabbi to the local water-carrier.

Then, like the darkest thunderclouds intruding on a sunny Shabbat picnic, come details of the Shoah: descriptions of witnessed atrocities, deportations and death camps. Necrologies – lists of the dead – are presented on pages with heavy black borders. Some books offer full obituaries with photographs of beloved mothers, fathers, children, grandparents, cousins and friends who, strangely and eerily, are almost never smiling.

Although not comprehensive, the necrologies still make yizkor books uniquely valuable to genealogists and family historians. A foremost authority on yizkor books, Zachary Baker, chief librarian at the YIVO Institute in New York, laments that professional historians have underutilized these first-hand sources, preferring more "objective" views that have not been filtered through the bleak prism of the Holocaust. Alas, a scholar once cavalierly dismissed these earnest monuments of love and grief as "tombstones, not books."

Verily, they are both. As sociologists Jack Kugelmass and Jonathan Boyarin observe in From A Ruined Garden: The Memorial Books of Polish Jewry, their 1983 anthology of translated excerpts from yizkor books: "The volumes typically open with a frontispiece featuring symbols of mourning as well as symbols of life destroyed: a tallit (prayer shawl) draped over a tombstone; a ghostly figure rising from the grave, his eyes covered by his hands and tears falling; a menorah overturned, its candle flames igniting the entire town; a tree cut down at the height of vitality, with a small green shoot growing from its stump."

Kugelmass and Boyarin ask an essential question: if there were no precedents for yizkor books in Jewish literary history, how did these tomes emerge as a distinct genre so quickly after the Shoah? The answer is that they were with us all along, in slightly disguised form, probably right from the Babylonian exile following the destruction of the First Temple.

Devastated by Christian crusaders on the march to Jerusalem, Jewish communities along the Rhine began to read from lists of dead at prayer services; over time, the names of victims of later massacres and catastrophes were added to these books. Many German communities maintained such memorbuecher; so did Vienna, Amsterdam and other diverse communities.

Such works were likely a precursor to Rabbi Nathan Hannover's famous 17th-century chronicle Yeven Metzulah (Abyss of Despair), which depicted Jewish life in Ukraine and eastern Poland during the Chmielnicki massacres of 1648-49. The author gave a vivid and graphic account of atrocities committed, but his first-hand narrative lacks a black-bordered necrology, the hallmark of the modern yizkor book. Less than three centuries later, in 1919, upon the very same Ukrainian killing fields, modern-day Cossacks slaughtered thousands of Jews in the town of Proskurov, now tellingly renamed Chmielnicki. Khurbn Proskurov, the memorial volume that appeared in 1924, is regarded as the first of the modern yizkor books.

Canada boasts two excellent yizkor-book collections, belonging respectively to the Jewish Public Library of Montreal and the Robarts Library of the University of Toronto.

Rehovot rabbi urges unity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Don't worry, G-d understands English perfectly," joked Rehovot Chief Rabbi Simcha HaCohen Kook, as he urged Jews to add personal petitions for fellow-Jews in their daily prayers.

"At least once a day, mention the situation of your brothers in Israel. Urge G-d to have rachamim, mercy."

Rabbi Kook was speaking at Or Chaim Yeshiva to a joint program of JEP, the Or Chaim Kollel, Bnei Akiva and Yavne Olami.

Especially in this time of tragedy in Israel, Rabbi Kook said, "every Jew has to be friends with each other."

To be a Jew, Rabbi Kook said, "means to try to find holiness in each person, at any time," and "to build a bridge between [the different] groups, or we will lose everything."

It also means, he said, recognizing the sanctity of the land.

Israel, he said, is called Eretz Yisrael, rather than Eretz Avraham or Eretz Yitzchak, because we have partners in our descent from Avraham and Yitzchak — Ishmael and Esau, who have, theoretically, the same right to the land.

"Jacob's name was changed to 'Israel' when he fought with the angel and won.

"Eretz Israel, then, is a country you have to fight for, but in a spiritual way, with hard work, attention and holiness," he said.

"While the Jews were wandering in the desert of Sinai, they got everything from G-d — maana, water, Moshe, the Torah itself. The moment we crossed the Jordan, that all stopped. We had to study the Torah ourselves."

Similarly, "The Torah won't come by itself to Toronto or Jerusalem. It will take time, effort and money."

Both the Temples were destroyed, Rabbi Kook said. Only the mishkan, the temporary sanctuary that housed the tablets of the covenant, was never destroyed, although it has been lost for centuries.

"That is because it was built directly according to the direction of Moshe, not with the help of foreign kings like the Temples were."

Holiness can only come from holiness, he said, decrying the many secular Jews who see no holiness in either Israel or Jerusalem, because they don't learn it in school.

"Five years ago, they would at least get one class about Yom Kippur. Now many don't hear a word. They don't even know the basics."

JTS students get taste of pulpit life

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

NEW YORK, N.Y. — The Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), New York training ground for Conservative rabbis, is making its presence felt at over 100 synagogues in the United States and Canada as part of its National Seminary Shabbat.

The last weekend in February was the Seminary Shabbat's main weekend, with 26 students travelling individually to take part in a program designed to give them a taste of pulpit experience while giving each congregation exposure to the type of person attending the seminary. The program resumed this year after a hiatus of several years.

"We often have images of rabbis being old and with grey beards," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation. "There are young rabbis, and it's very important for synagogues and particularly for young people to see rabbis as vibrant, young participants in Jewish life, because they become an accessible model for them."

Beth Tzedec was one of three Canadian shuls participating in Seminary Shabbat. Toronto's Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and London's Congregation Or Shalom also took part.

"Having a national Seminary Shabbat links Conservative synagogues to one another and to the Seminary," said Rebecca Jacobs, co-ordinator of the program, in a news release. "On that Shabbat, thousands of Jews in synagogues from Manhattan to Louisville, KY to Prairie Village, KS, will all meet Seminary students face to face. There is something truly inspiring in that."

Rabbi Larry Lander of Or Shalom called first-year rabbinical student Jennifer Tobenstein "a good role model." The 23-year-old native of Montreal, a third of whose classmates are female, spoke at the egalitarian London synagogue about her experience as a Canadian female rabbinical student and led a study session on Beruriah, a respected female Talmud scholar of the second century.

"I enjoyed it so much, I'm doing it again in Minneapolis at the end of March," said Tobenstein in a phone interview from New York. "I don't have many opportunities to give sermons to large numbers of people. Every time I do I enjoy it more and more."

A former Jewish Theological Seminary student, now serving at Beth El Synagogue in East Windsor, New Jersey, considers the Seminary Shabbat in which he participated in Toronto 10 years ago "the pivotal change weekend for me."

At the time, Rabbi Jay Kornsgold, then an undergraduate student, planned to become a lawyer and enter politics. Congregants at Beth David, where he spoke on Shabbat morning about life at the seminary, broke into spontaneous applause at the end of his sermon.

Rabbi Philip Scheim recalls being impressed with Kornsgold's obvious potential. This year his shul hosted student Lewis Warshauer, who met with congregants after services to discuss the issues raised in his sermon on a less formal basis.

"It's nice to see what the future's going to look like," said Rabbi Scheim.

Fifth-year rabbinical student Ron Fish, 26, who took part in the Seminary Shabbat at Beth Tzedec, would advise young people considering entering JTS that they "should expect to benefit greatly from the community the seminary provides," but cautions that they must commit themselves to working hard.

Diamond lands Israel project

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Architect Jack Diamond and his company have won the design competition for the new Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem, the $40-million building to be completed by 1998 for the state's 50th anniversary.

The Foreign Ministry facilitates diplomatic relations with 105 countries that recognize Israel. It will be located in the national precinct, which also houses the Knesset and the Supreme Court.

The contract was won by A.J. Diamond, Donald Schmitt and Company in a joint venture with Kolker, Kolker, Epstein Architects of Jerusalem. This team recently completed the City Hall complex for Jerusalem and is currently producing the Gateway project at the entrance to Jerusalem, a mixed-use complex including a multi-purpose stadium, retail space and hotels.

It's been a banner year for Diamond, a South African-born architect, who became an officer of the Order of Canada, and whose firm beat out 26 other competitors to design a new Jewish Community Centre on New York's Upper West side, north of Lincoln Centre.

Model of a new foreign ministry in Jerusalem.

This year as well, his firm, in association with Boigon Pillow Architects, won the contract for the new Baycrest Home for the Aged.

Diamond is ecstatic when he speaks of Jerusalem (he has visited Israel's capital at least 50 times) and of his relations with the Jerusalem architects associated with the winning design.

"When the first stage was finished, the Israel government representatives asked the remaining contenders to have their refined designs ready by Jan. 29," he said. "I objected because there was a lot to do and I had promised my family a holiday. My Jerusalem associates agreed and they joined my family in a rented house in Venice, where we finished the design and all had a wonderful time."

To cap it all off, 72 of Diamond's water color paintings and drawings of Israel, Italy and other countries are on exhibit until April 20 at the Italian Cultural Institute, 496 Huron Street (416-921-3802). The exhibit, titled Spirited Places comprises travel sketches from his many voyages.

This year also saw the culmination of his intensive work as one of the five commissioners who produced the Anne Golden report on the future of the Greater Toronto Area.

"My work with the commission was better than any PhD seminar," he said. "I'm extremely fond of Toronto."

Sandy and Kitchie Hofstedter

GUESTS OF HONOUR

Ner Israel Yeshiva is privileged to bestow this well deserved tribute on Sandy and Kitchie for their respective roles as founders and officers of the Yeshiva and Women's Auxiliary.

This evening coincides with Sandy and Kitchie's 50th Wedding Anniversary and they have chosen to mark this occasion with the establishment of The Torah Endowment Fund that will help the Yeshiva carry on its holy and beneficial work in higher Jewish Education.

The Hofstedter's noble personalities, dynamic efforts and philanthropic endeavours have indeed enriched Toronto as well as Jewish communities throughout the world.

Mission members reveal hundreds of memories

Some, like David McKee, were experiencing Israel for the first time. Others, like Marsha Zinberg, were returning after several decades. All were members of Mission 3000, the largest organized tour to Israel in Canadian history.

Last month, Mission 3000, a United Israel Appeal/United Jewish Appeal mega-tour, whisked 1150 participants-among them, nearly 400 Torontonians - from Israel's northern border to its southern tip.

At the mission's opening ceremonies in Metulla's Canada Centre, UIA Canada executive vice-president Steve Ain spoke proudly of the Lebanese border town's Canadian connection. "It is incredible to reflect on what we've accomplished together," he said.

The Canada Centre recreation complex, with what was then Israel's first skating rink, was built in the early 80's, largely with Canadian donations. Today, Canada Centre, thanks to William and Dorothy Drevnig, houses Israel's only Olympic-size rink.

In Jerusalem, Prime Minister Shimon Peres congratulated participants for joining the mission. "You bought a ticket with your heart," he said.

Before stepping off the plane at Ben Gurion Airport, mission member David McKee had explored Israel only through Amos Oz novels. He was particularly impressed with the northern Israel countryside and the "magic of Jerusalem." David's wife, Elaine, lived in Beersheva for 9 months, 22 years ago, and hadn't been back since. "I didn't recognize the country," she told Community Matters.

For Marsha Zinberg, light years of history had passed since her last visit in 1966. "The last time I was here," she recalled," Jerusalem was partitioned."

Dr. Warren Sinukoff, whose memories of Israel were 31 years old, said his head was "swimming" from everything he saw. "Israel is so much more than just pieces of land or sculpture," he observed.

Mission 3000 was a birthday present from his wife, Annette, for 65 year old Philip Schenker, a survivor, who lost 5 brothers and 2 sisters in the Holocaust. "If only we had an Israel then," Philip reflected on the bus ride to Eilat, Israel's southernmost resort city.

Behind the grandeur of Eilat's luxury hotels, lie underprivileged neighbourhoods requiring assistance supplied by UJA, which designated Eilat and the neighbouring Eilot region, Project Renewal communities.

"I want to personally thank the Jewish community of Toronto," said Eilat mayor Gabi Kadosh, "for helping us strengthen our city."

Mission bus 22 captains Carole Sterling (L) and George Weinberger present a Mission 3000 t-shirt to Greta Gal of Kibbutz Kfar Szold where bus 22'ers stayed on the first night of the trip.

Meeting makes family history

Family get togethers couldn't get much more emotional than this one.

During the trip, Mission 3000 participant Michael Levy met his grandfather, a Tel Aviv area resident, for the first time.

"I was nervous in the car on the way over," Michael remembered. "I saw him pacing in the lobby as we drove up to his flat. We hugged and kissed. I said 'shalom saba, nice to meet you.' We were both very emotional. We stared at each other for a few minutes. He was so pensive. He asked me 'what took you so long?'"

Michael's grandfather, Shalom Zacharowitz speaks no English and Michael does not speak Hebrew, but the language gap was quickly bridged.

"He's my only living grandfather. I was so glad to meet him," Michael said.

Junior UJA: here's your chance to join

If the success of the Junior UJA Club is any indication of the younger generation's commitment to tzedakah, the future looks brighter than ever. In just five months, more than 700 kids have joined the only club of its kind in North America.

The Junior UJA club was launched, together with junior UJA news, in December, 1995 to familiarize children with UJA's activities. To date, Junior UJA and the Bathurst Jewish Centre have hosted both a Chanuka party and a Purim party with more special events planned this year. Permanent cards and neon rulers have been sent to all club members, who can expect the next fun filled issue of junior UJA news before Passover.

Many Junior UJA Club members are also participants in UJA's Tzedakah All Star program, in which children deposit unopened gifts at several depots. The presents are distributed to less fortunate kids across the city. Over 500 gifts have been collected so far at Tzedakah All Star boxes located in schools and the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

"The Junior UJA Club and the Tzedakah All Star Team are pioneering projects for us, not just in the Greater Toronto Area but across North America," said UJA Campaign Director, Ted Sokolsky. "We're introducing a new generation to tzedakah at its best and the success of this experiment is really heart warming."

For kids in grades 1-6, who have not yet joined the Junior UJA Club, please complete the application below and mail it to us. Your gift and membership card will be sent soon after.

March and festival salute Jerusalem

The 1996 Community March for Israel is shaping up to be an event fit for a king. King David, that is. That's because this year's march, Journey to Jerusalem, and the festival that follows, are celebrating Jerusalem 3000, the 3000th anniversary of King David's designation of Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

UJA's single largest community event, which attracts up to 7000 participants, will take place on Sunday, May 26. This year's route will begin at the Promenade Shopping Centre and end at North York's Centennial Centre on Finch, west of Bathurst for the Jerusalem 3000 Festival.

Jeff Cohen, the co-chair of Journey to Jerusalem with Maura Cooperberg, says although the march has always taken place rain or shine, this year's indoor festival will be dry no matter what. "Weather," he noted, "is just not a factor this year."

For the first time, the Jerusalem 3000 Festival, which will feature Israeli music, entertainment and cuisine, pony rides, a petting zoo and a barbecue is being co-sponsored by UJA and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

According to festival co-chair Gilda Niman, "the cooperation between CZF and UJA is really helping people get into the Jerusalem 3000 spirit, marking a milestone in Jewish history. The partnership of two key community organizations symbolizes just how strongly Jewish life centres around Jerusalem."

Organizers are looking forward to a record turnout at this year's Community March for Israel and Jerusalem 3000 Festival.

Recruitment for the march, at over 30 supplementary and day schools, will begin after Passover, with special school assemblies and presentations.

Recruitment co-chairs Fran Grundman and Arlyne Zimmerman say they're going "full force" to find even more participants than in previous years. Those who bring in sponsor sheets with a minimum of $18.00 in pledges before the march, will receive a free t-shirt. Participants raising more than $50.00 will be eligible to win other prizes including two round trip tickets to Israel.

Funds raised through the march will assist youngsters who are recent immigrants to Israel.

This year, UJA and CZF march and festival organizers will be encouraging more participation by people living in the southern section of Metro Toronto.

Federation relieves financial confusion

Keeping up with budget changes is a tough but important task, especially when your financial future is at stake.

In order to clarify the new rules, UJA and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto are hosting a series of educational seminars, primarily for senior members of the community, on financial and estate management.

Experts will cover topics such as new regulations for charitable donation deductions, RRSPs and RRIFs, the importance of wills, estate planning and the Substitute Decisions Act.

The first seminar is scheduled for Sunday April 14, 9:30 a.m. to 12:00 at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street, 4th floor. The following two will be held Wednesday, May 8 at 6:00 p.m. and Sunday, June 9 at 9:30 a.m.

To register call Sylvia Astrug at (416) 635-2883 ext. 115. For more information contact Marc Bookbinder at (416) 631-5703.

A warm welcome from Shalom Toronto

Sylvia Peck (2nd from left), the Co-chair of Shalom Toronto, a program of Jewish Women's Federation, and Rosalie Flomen, JWF Vice-President, were on hand to host a reception following a March 1st Citizenship and Immigration swearing in ceremony.

Congratulations greet Federation web site

It's been a mega-byte debut for Jewish Toronto, the Federation's new web site at htpp://www.feduja.org.

"The response has been great," says Jewish Toronto steering committee member, Bob Cherniak, the leader of the site's technical team. "We've had a lot of inquiries about posting information on the site and a lot of good reviews about what's already on there."

One 'weber' thanked the Federation "for providing the Toronto Jewish community with a tool that I think will be invaluable for the future."

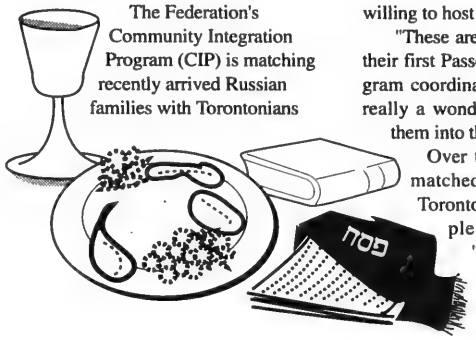
Ed Goldenberg from Philadelphia's Jewish Federation believes Jewish Toronto will be "the envy of every Federation."

Jewish Toronto includes a community calendar, a directory of community institutions and organizations, Jewish holiday information, the Federation's Community Matters newspaper supplement, recent news releases, a "youth lounge" with an "e-zine" publication and even links to other sites.

A team of more than 75 volunteers, led by project coordinator Jay Brodbar, worked for several months on building and implementing the site, which was officially launched on March 5. Federation internet specialists are now conducting seminars about the internet. The next one is scheduled for March 26, 7-10 p.m. at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

Jewish organizations interested in promoting their activities or events on the web site should contact the Internet Hotline at (416) 635-2883 ext. 700.

Seeking seder partners for Pesach



The Federation's Community Integration Program (CIP) is matching recently arrived Russian families with Torontonians willing to host them for Passover seders.

"These are people who are spending their first Passover in Canada," said program coordinator Marsha Slavens. "It's really a wonderful feeling to welcome them into the community."

Over the past 6 years, CIP has matched about 500 Russian and Toronto families. "A lot of people," pointed out Slavens, "have hosted the same family for 6 years in a row." One man, she said, who hadn't been to a seder in 70 years, stood up to ask the four questions.

Slavens and her committee are very careful about matching people by age, interests and religious observance. She believes "that's probably why we're so successful."

CIP surveys show that lasting relationships often result from seder hosting. "A lot of things happen spontaneously," noted Slavens.

If you are interested in hosting a Russian family this Passover, please call (416) 636-1880 ext. 380.

Cards that Care

"The Blessing" by Lynne Feldman

Passover, the celebration of our freedom, also celebrates our responsibility to each other. As we remember the exodus from Egypt, we also remember those whose freedom from poverty, pain and uncertainty has yet to arrive.

UJA Passover Tribute Cards symbolize the spirit of this special holiday. Proceeds will assist Jews wherever they need our help, and you'll also be honouring recipients with a donation in their name.

For more information, call Michelle Birman at (416) 631-5685 today and order Cards that care!

Condo residents upset by Kalejs

revulsion at having Konrads Kalejs, a former commander of a Latvian killing squad, living in their building.

Kalejs, a citizen of Australia and a visitor to Canada, is currently the subject of deportation proceedings that have been in process, off an on, since June 1995. He has already been barred from the United States after an immigration judge found Kalejs served as a company commander in the Latvian Auxiliary Security Police (Arajs Kommando) and commanded guards at Nazi concentration camps where thousands of civilians were killed.

Ironically, the building in which Kalejs now lives has many Jewish residents, including Holocaust survivors. Their anger and frustration was palpable at the residents' meeting last week.

"I've lost faith in the Canadian government," Smith told The CJN. "The government cannot protect me. I'm a citizen and he is not."

Vera Peter, who has a tattoo from Auschwitz on her arm, said she had met Kalejs, who exercises at the building's pool, before she knew who he was. After she learned about his past, "I bumped into him and I felt very uncomfortable. I looked over him like he was air."

Anastasia Schwartz pulled no punches, expressing her displeasure at Kalejs' presence. "Let's kick the s.o.b. out of here," she said. "What right does he have to be here? We're Canadians, we have rights."

During the meeting, which was chaired by condominium resident Rhonda Pasternack, one participant complained that "the [legal] system is not working for Canadians here. It's protecting war criminals. It's disgusting."

Pasternack said she organized the meeting after seeing a newspaper photograph of Kalejs and his female companion about three weeks ago. She and other building residents recognized the pair as living in the building.

"I see him every morning coming out of the men's health club after his workout," she said. "I knew I had to do something."

She decided to organize the meeting to convey to public officials the displeasure and frustration of the building's residents at having an accused war criminal in their midst.

Pasternack said she is hoping to organize condominium members to attend Kalejs' next deportation hearing on May 1 as well as write letters to the ministers of Justice and Immigration.

"Maybe something can be done," she said. "And maybe we can make him a little uncomfortable in his surroundings because we're uncomfortable that he lives here."

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, told the meeting that government officials "bungled" the Kalejs case. "The government appears not to give a damn."

Kalejs "knew he could come here and have an easy way of it."

In Parliament last week M.P. Jim Peterson said "Kelejs is alleged to have participated in the death of 27,000 Jews. I ask the Minister of Immigration why the unconscionable delay in dealing with the continuing presence in Canada of this alleged Nazi war criminal. Surely we can do better."

Robillard responded that "Canada is not and will not become a refuge for war criminals" and that she views the issue with concern.

The government "will act with all due speed," the minister added.

Bouchard review mixed

and Quebec, economically and socially."

Kussner was not impressed by Bouchard's assurances of English rights in education and health care. "He's saying 'trust me,' but past history has shown we should be wary of him."

Businessman Thomas Hecht was disappointed that Bouchard did not clearly repudiate Parizeau's referendum-night words, while Rabbi Reuben Poupko found Bouchard's attempt at humor about "anglos go home" graffiti "inappropriate."

Law professor Irwin Cotler appreciated the premier's affirmation that minorities are equal citizens and should feel at home here. "I was pleased by his honesty ... This was not an attempt to get people on board or to make promises ... He's saying we should not feel alienated or marginalized."

Lawyer Morton Bessner feels Bouchard has "opened the door a crack" but "the real test is where we go from here."

Perhaps 20 percent of the 400 invited persons were Jewish, with large representations from Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and FEDERATION CJA, as well as individuals from the fields of law, academia, business and the media. Jack Jedwab, CJC Quebec director, said Bouchard's office had asked CJC to suggest 50 names for the guest list.

"It was mostly motherhood and apple pie," said Robert Libman, regional B'nai Brith director and former Equality party leader.

Libman thinks Bouchard held the event to squelch the partition movement and, in so doing, divide anglophones. "Because there was no major announcement, such as softening the language laws or setting up a task force on anglos, you have to question his motives."

Yom Ha'atzmaut Teen Cartoon Festival

We are asking all teenagers to turn on their creative juices and submit to us cartoons dealing with the subject of Israel. In particular, we are looking for cartoons which have both artistic and intellectual merit. They may be funny, serious, satiric or cute. We are looking for cartoons which poignantly and tastefully convey one of the many truths about life in Israel.

Who can enter: All teenagers are eligible except the children of CJN employees.

How to enter: You may submit as many entries as you like.

The judges will choose cartoons which are well-illustrated, clever and tasteful.

Six cartoons will be selected as winners: three cartoons from contestants 15 years of age and younger, and three cartoons from contestants 16 to 19 years of age inclusive.

The cartoons must be drawn in black and white. This will ensure that the cartoon reproduces as well as possible.

Please write your name, age, address and phone number on the back of your submission.

You may mail or deliveryour submission to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont., M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the cartoon, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on April 15, 1996.

Prizes: The "winning" cartoons will be published in The CJN Yom Ha'atzmaut issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a $50.00 cheque.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only six will be chosen for publication. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: The contestants whose cartoons are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, April 19, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning submissions will be published in The CJN of April 25, 1996.

We hope the contest generates original, witty, imaginative and possibly even inspiring thought. We look forward to receiving your entries.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Police lay charges against former JCC employee

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — A former employee of the Calgary Jewish Community Council (CJCC) has been charged with at least 18 counts of possession of child pornography, sexual assault and sexual interference with a child under 14 years of age.

David Webber, 35, was arrested Feb. 22. Police seized a number of Polaroid photographs and written materials.

Several children alleged to be victims of sexual assault have already been interviewed.

Police are "wading through a variety of written and photographic materials that identify potential victims," said Sgt. Jim Fisher of the Calgary Police Service.

One document alleged to have been written by Webber contains several names. A page seen on a television news report here showed seven of the 14 entries marked with stars of David.

While police are not certain of the significance of the lists, they are regarding those named as potential victims of abuse, Fisher told the Jewish Free Press.

In 1991, Webber was hired as mashgiach of the CJCC, a job he held until December 1992. At the time of his arrest, he was working as a local kosher butcher.

On Feb. 23, Webber was granted bail, with the condition that he not go within one block of a school or playground, or anywhere children are present. His bail was posted by Rabbi Allen Saks, principal of Akiva Academy, "to facilitate [Webber's] immediate professional psychiatric handling of a medical situation," Rabbi Saks said in a statement.

But Webber was rearrested just hours after making bail for being near a schoolyard.

Fisher said he believes Webber is in Edmonton undergoing psychiatric assessment.

No court dates have yet been set because police need time to wade through the materials, Fisher added.

B.C. launches campaign against racism

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A campaign to combat racism in British Columbia has been launched by the province's multiculturalism minister, Ujal Dosanjh.

In one of the events, the minister unveiled a transit bus poster which read: "Don't be blinded by color." The message was based on the winning entry by Vancouver Technical School students in a province-wide multicultural video contest.

"I am heartened to see our young citizens taking initiatives towards multiculturalism and eliminating racism," said Dosanjh at the unveiling held at the school. "Racism is not someone else's problem. It affects us all."

Whether it takes the form of name-calling and fighting in schools, hate slogans, spray-painting on buildings or jokes exchanged in social groups, racism isolates, oppresses and excludes people, he said.

In another event, Multiculturalism B.C., a government agency, invited over 1,500 participants from a wide cross-section of communities to a two-day forum held in the Justice Institute of B.C. in Vancouver to discuss ways and means to deal with the problem of racism in society.

A highlight of the campaign was a ceremony at Vancouver city hall where Mayor Philip Owen read a proclamation declaring March 21 as the International Day to Eliminate Racial Discrimination. This was sponsored by city council, the Vancouver Multicultural Society and the Vancouver police department.

Holocaust Memorial Day will be marked at Beth Israel Synagogue on April 16 and Shalom Vancouver, an agency of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, will hold a Jewish newcomer party at the Jewish Community Centre on April 17.

A pictorial remembrance, The Warsaw Ghetto, opens at the Holocaust Education Centre on April 18.

Keegstra saga comes to a happy conclusion

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Alberta's most famous motor mechanic, James Keegstra, had his day in the Supreme Court here three weeks ago and he lost big.

He was branded a hatemonger by the highest court in the land. If you put any store in judicial rulings, it doesn't get any clearer than that.

And now Keegstra is staring at the possibility of up to two years in jail later this year. He has already been fined $3,000. The Alberta Court of Appeal will decide.

The decision against the former Eckville, Alta., high school teacher, who spewed vile hatred against Jews in his classroom for 14 years before anybody cared enough to complain, brings to an end the longest legal case over hatemongering in Canadian history.

There is a certain irony no doubt in the fact that it took exactly 14 years for the crown prosecutors to get Keegstra — the same length of time he was at his dirty business in the classroom.

The students whose minds he systematically tried to poison have grown up and today many have families of their own to whom they are passing on life's lessons learned in Eckville.

Reporters who have gone out and located them across Canada and North America have discovered that in some cases Keegstra's lessons stuck, in varying degree, of course. In others they didn't. They were rejected utterly.

Keegstra didn't have to go before the Supreme Court. It was entirely his own decision.

It was he who approached the Supreme Court to challenge a decision by the Alberta Court of Appeal that he should go on trial again — for the third time — on the original 1984 charge of willfully spreading hatred against an identifiable group.

Who knows what a third trial would have brought? With a sympathetic jury, he might have gotten off. He could have pleaded that 14 years before the courts amounted to an undue delay and an infringement of his constitutional right to a speedy trial. The case might have been thrown out.

Instead he went for a big victory. He wanted the Supreme Court to rule that Canada's hate law is unconstitutional, even though it ruled only six yeara ago that the law is constitutional.

As the judges explained to Keegstra and his lawyer Douglas Christie in court three weeks ago, the Supreme Court can reverse itself, and it did recently, but it usually doesn't do it "in the same generation" and never without what it considers good reason.

Apparently they didn't find good reason in the Keegstra case.

The judges decided what the criminal court had ruled was "a complete answer."

That means that in hate propaganda cases, the accused has to prove the truth of what he advances. This is called "the reverse onus" in hate propaganda cases, and last week Supreme Court ruled that it is quite constitutional.

If it wasn't, it would mean that when someone is charged with spreading hatred against a particular group, the crown prosecutor has to prove that not only did the accused know what he was saying was false, but that he spread the hatred deliberately, maliciously, on purpose, knowing fully all the time that it was false.

That's asking a lot of a crown prosecutor. It almost means having to go inside the hatemonger's head and prove what he was really thinking, to win the case.

Virtually every hatemonger in the country would have a legitimate defence, because almost all of them really believe the hatred they are spewing. That's why they are so persistent and so unrepentant.

If the Supreme Court had ruled the hate law is unconstitutional, it would have amounted to open season on Jews and every other identifiable group in Canada.

The decision is bad news for Ernst Zundel and about half a dozen others whose trials were awaiting the outcome of the Keegstra Supreme Court case.

Keegstra, in a way, went to bat for all of them. He was in the Supreme Court for the whole Canadian hate movement.

If he had won his case on constitutional grounds, they would all have gotten off. It was a chance in a thousand and he took it, on the advice of his lawyer, Christie.

In the end Keegstra lost, and the hate movement lost.

Irwin Cotler, the Montreal jurist, who attended the case, sees it slightly differently: "No, I think the country won," said Cotler, smiling.

Yerushalmi to be honored

OTTAWA — Congregation Beth Shalom West will host a gala honoring Eli Yerushalmi on May 12 at 7 p.m.

Laila dé Oro (A Night of Gold) will feature a presentation of Sephardi music by the shul's Cantor Daniel Benlolo. Traditional Sephardi food will be served.

During the evening, the Ottawa Jewish community will pay tribute to Yerushalmi and his family, who are returning to Israel after three years of service in the Israeli Embassy. Yerushalmi has been the charge d'affaires for the embassy and, most recently, Israel's acting ambassador to Canada.

Representatives of the Ottawa Va'ad Ha'Ir, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Israeli Embassy will be participating in the tribute.

The cost of the evening is $36 per person (with a tax receipt for $18 each). Tickets can be reserved by calling Bev Glube at Beth Shalom West 613-723-1800.

Sometimes the Simplest Things are the Most Special.

Everyone has their own idea of what simple means. To us at The Simple Alternative it means good taste and common sense. Simplicity is one of the hallmarks of Jewish funeral tradition. Expensive caskets and elaborate services are not part of this tradition. And, as many of our families tell us: sometimes the simplest things are the most special.

Holocaust scholar captivates audiences

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Jewish community is the only community that has not come to grips with the Holocaust, said historian and Holocaust scholar, Raul Hilberg, recently at McMaster University.

Hilberg was here as the Hooker Distinguished Visiting Professor, to deliver two lectures sponsored by the Department of History, with the Faculty of Humanities and the Theme School on International Justice and Human Rights. Both drew a packed audience of mostly students and faculty, with a sprinkling of Jews from the community.

In the first, Auschwitz and the Evolution of Nazi Mass Killing, Hilberg traced the history and technology of mass killing as it evolved from the eugenics theories already current among German scientists in the 1920s, through the gassing of mentally and physically defective children and adults in the '30s and early '40s, to the extermination camps.

In the second, The Holocaust: Modes of Memorialization, he said that in the years immediately following World War II, "there was almost an ideology" of forgetting the Holocaust.

Survivors and veterans were told to forget, he said, and the silence continued until the turning point in 1978 in the United States, with the showing of Gerald Green's TV mini-series, The Holocaust.

Students had become interested in the Holocaust even earlier, but now they were coming to him with questions, and people in universities all over the country were sending "frantic letters asking if I had a syllabus for teaching a Holocaust course," Hilberg said.

The Germans had "difficulties" in dealing with the Holocaust, but today, Hilberg said, "nowhere is the Holocaust discussed more, written about more and understood more than in Germany."

Yet in the Jewish community, Hilberg said, "there has been no education until very recently."

Part of the Jewish community's problem in dealing with the Holocaust, he said, is that it will not look at the perpetrators, and that its "organized research has not extended to an understanding of the mechanism by which [European] Jewry was destroyed."

The Jewish attitude is: "Depict the victim but do not depict the perpetrators," Hilberg said, pointing out that the reason can be found in the biblical injunction "to remember what Amalek did to the Jews, but may his name be erased."

Another problem, he suggested, is Orthodox Jewry's position "that G-d does what he understands and we do not question it; nor do we question why G-d does it."

"It is ironic," observed Hilberg, "that those who call the most for remembrance, the Jewish community itself, are left with these taboos. But how can one remember without knowing the details?"

With 5 oz plastic wine glasses, I would not have drunk as much.
With disposable tableware every daughter would be saved from washing dishes.
The wise son asks: "Why didn't she buy discounted disposables at Party Supply Depot?"
And Mom heard their groans and she promised "... this year we wash dishes again, next year we buy diposables from Party Supply Depot"
The simple son asks: "• Is it cheaper? • Is it easier? • Is it useful? • Is it colourful?".
The wicked son says: " ... Oy! A plastic tablecloth would not have stained".

PASSOVER FOODS

Passover really begins with a cleaning frenzy

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Ladies and gentlemen and children of all ages, it's time to start your vacuum cleaner engines. Purim is over and the frenzy of cleaning that proceeds Passover is about to begin.

It's the time of year that we all love and dread simultaneously. We're going to clean and polish and clean and move stuff and clean and throw things away and clean and change dishes and clean and shop and then, we get to invite more family and friends than we have room for to join us for the seders. All the while, lurking at the back of our minds is the knowledge that we've got to get rid of all our chometz before this whole megillah gets started (oops, sorry, wrong holiday).

Now, nobody wants to throw away stuff that's still good. It's taken us all year to collect it. But, then, nobody really wants to store it either. We just don't have the room. Closing up all the cabinets and leaving the Passover food stuff on the counter doesn't always work either. There's never enough space for the dishes let alone eight jars of gefilte fish and 12 boxes of matzah. It's so much easier to just clean out your pantry and stock it with all the stuff you purchase just for the eight days of Pesach. (Confess, would you really eat that Passover cereal any other time of the year?)

So the question becomes, what do you do with those half eaten boxes of cookies and pasta and bottles of ketchup? My solution ... Improvise with style. Take what you've got and create combinations that will knock your families socks off. I'm not, however, advocating a casserole with 27 different types of beans and cookies in it. Just something a little different and unique. The following recipes should help get you started.

FRUITY RICE SALAD WITH RASPBERRY VINAIGRETTE

2 cups cooked rice (brown works really well)
2 cups broccoli, cut into small pieces, blanched and chilled
2 cups canned pineapple, drained
1 can mandarin orange, drained
1 red pepper, diced
½ cup chopped onion (red onion add a sweet taste)
1 can (12 ounces) tuna, drained
Salad greens

Raspberry Vinagrette Dressing

½ cup apple cider vinegar (regular will do)
1 tbsp. raspberry preserves
2 tbsp. orange or lemon juice
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. seasoned salt
½ tsp. crushed red pepper
1 tsp. minced garlic
½ cup olive oil

In a large bowl, combine the rice, broccoli, pineapple, oranges, pepper and onion. Toss well. Add raspberry vinegrette dressing and toss well. Cover and refrigerate for several hours before serving. Just before serving add the tuna and toss gently. Serve on salad greens either as individual servings or as a main dish. Yield: 6 main course servings.

SPICY CHICKEN AND PASTA WITH GARLIC AND PINE NUTS

3 tbsp. olive oil
3 tsp. minced garlic
2 cups sliced mushrooms
½ cup chopped onions
½ tsp. crushed red pepper
2½ cups chopped plum tomatoes
2½ cups chicken broth
½ tsp. salt (optional)
¼ tsp. coarsely ground pepper
8 to 10 oz. uncooked linguini
1½ to 2 cups cooked chicken, cut into bite size pieces
⅓ cup chopped fresh cilantro or parsley
⅓ cup toasted pine nuts (almonds will work as well)

In a large skillet heat olive oil and sauté garlic, mushrooms, onion and red pepper. Sauté until just tender. Add tomatoes, salt, pepper and chicken broth. Bring the mixture to a boil. Break the linguini noodles in half and mix them into the boiling mixture. Cover, reduce heat and cook for about 10 minutes or until the noodles are cooked throughout. Check at about five

Just try and say no to those snacks

If you were told that you had to stop eating snacks, how long would it be before you wanted one?

The snack experts at Christie Brown & Co. say the answer is less than one hour for 15 percent of Canadians while for 35 percent it's less than a day (source: February Omnitel survey of 2,000 Canadians). Residents in Atlantic Canada are most likely to want a snack within an hour (23 percent) while those in Quebec showed the greatest fortitude with nine percent noting they could last at least a month before temptation struck.

But how long could you actually resist the temptation to snack if told not to? Christie Brown notes that willpower lasts only slightly longer than desire with 23 percent of Canadians snacking within 24 hours and 43 percent succumbing within a week!

In the survey, Christie Brown asked Canadians to name the person they would most like to share a snack with. Spouses were the most popular choice, identified by 41 percent of male respondents and 32 percent of women. Children were a distant second (13 percent) followed by a friend or best friend (10 percent). Quebecers were most likely to choose a friend/best friend to share a snack with and least likely to choose a spouse. And Albertans were twice as likely to choose their parents for a snack partner than respondents in the rest of Canada.

The most popular suggestions were to give up television followed by alcohol. According to the survey, British Columbians were twice as likely to give up sex as respondents elsewhere in Canada, while Ontarians were more eager to forego vegetables such as spinach, broccoli and turnip.

What prompts a snack attack. Through other Christie Brown consumer surveys, the company found the number one reason is a "craving for food' — seven out of 10 Canadians snack to keep going until the next meal. But the second reason for snacking is the desire to treat yourself. There's no doubt that snacks and pleasure go hand-in-hand.

Despite what many people think, less than one-third of Canadians snack because they feel depressed. But, Christie Brown noted that significantly more English Canadians tend to sanck when bored compared to French Canadians.

"Nearly 75 percent of Canadians eat snacks at least once a day and snacks have become much more than a bite to eat between meals," said Sara Feldman of Christie Brown & Co. "Today, snacks are actually replacing meals. Approximately 16 percent of Canadians prefer to snack throughout the day rather than eating three meals."

Not surprisingly, the most frequent snackers are those between 17 and 24 years of age. Christie Brown notes that you're most likely to snack in the evening or mid-afternoon — and if you're watching TV or a movie.

Support for snacking is now coming from health professionals who are encouraging healthy snacking as an important part of a healthy diet, recognizing the importance of smaller meals throughout the day. That's good news because according to Christie Brown & Co., one out of two Canadians say that "although they watch their diet, they will not give up snacking."

"People seem to understand the moderation message of Canada's Food Guide to Healty Eating," said Feldman. "Surveys we conducted over the last two years indicate consumers know that snacks have a role to play, so it's all right to indulge as long as you usually follow a balanced diet."

Snacking with Cindy Crawford

Christie Brown notes that while only three percent of Canadians surveyed said they'd most like to share a snack with an entertainment personality, Baywatch actress Pamela Anderson and supermodels Cindy Crawford and Claudia Schiffer did rate particular attention.

And yes, there are solitary snackers. Five percent of Canadiansd said they would prefer to savor the snack experience alone.

Let's say you had to make a choice: give up snacking or give up something else. What would you choose? When Christie Brown asked Canadians, their answers ranged from housework to paying taxes and bills to exercise to work. Only three percent of respondents would prefer to give up snacks.

Steaks really taste better with mushrooms, onions

GRILLED STEAK, MUSHROOM AND ONION SALAD
(Foodland Ontario)

Very few things go better with steak than mushrooms and onions. When served on a bed of greens, then drizzled with a tasty dressing, this combination is ideal when you've worked up a hearty appetite. For a unique taste, try grilling the radicchio. It will turn brown, but tastes delicious.

⅓ cup Passover balsamic vinegar
1 clove garlic
½ tsp each salt and pepper
⅓ cup Passover olive oil
½ lb small mushrooms
Vegetable oil
2 filets or rib eye steaks, about 1¼ lb total
6 green onions
1 small head radicchio
1 small head leaf lettuce
1 large tomato, cut into wedges

In a small bowl, whisk vinegar with garlic, salt and pepper. Gradually whisk in olive oil. Set aside.

To grill mushrooms easily, thread them onto skewers. Brush lightly with oil; then place on greased grill over medium-high heat. Add steak to grill. Cook for five minutes, turning mushrooms frequently and brushing with oil if necessary; turn steak.

Lightly brush green onions with oil and place on grill. Cook three to five min. more, turning onions frequently and brushing lightly with oil if necessary, until steak is rare or medium rare. Remove steak and vegetables from grill. Let steak stand about five min; slice thinly on the diagonal.

Meanwhile, tear radicchio and leaf lettuce into bite-size pieces; arrange on four dinner plates. Slice green onions into one-inch pieces. Arrange green onion, mushrooms and steak on dinner plates around lettuce. Garnish with tomato wedges. Whisk dressing and drizzle over salad.

How to overcome your fear of matzah

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

It is with equal parts of joy and dread that I look forward to the coming of Passover.

The joy comes from the knowledge that most of the people I love best in the world will be with me and my family celebrating and sharing our seders. It also comes from the awesome realization that at no other time in the year will my house be quite this clean.

The dread part comes from the knowledge of what all that matzah is going to do to my digestive track. Don't misunderstand, I love matzah. I gobble it up with butter and jelly in the morning. I inhale it with chopped liver for lunch and I snarf it with everything for dinner. However, for me, consuming more than a piece or two of matzah a day is like having your car double parked in a no parking zone. You never know when things are going to start moving.

I know that there are fellow sufferers out there who have the same love-hate relationship with matzah. The only way to keep things moving along (sorry about that) is to make sure that when you're eating your annual ton of matzah that you also consume an equal or greater amount of fruits, vegetables and liquids.

Cutting back on the amount of meats and fats you consume during the holiday is also a great help in keeping things going (sorry again, I just couldn't resist the pun). Snacking on dried or fresh fruits and raw vegetables is also helpful. This year, we should all promise to use a little more self-control when it comes to opening and eating that entire last can of chocolate chip macaroons or that seventh matzah ball.

The following recipes are simple and totally pareve so that they can accompany any meal. With these recipes you can eat to your heart's (and stomach's) content.

HONEY AMBROSIA

4 medium oranges, peeled and sliced crosswise
3 bananas, sliced
½ cup orange juice
¼ cup honey
2 tablespoons lemon juice
¼ cup flaked coconut
canned cherries, drained, optional

Combine sliced fruit in a medium bowl, toss lightly. Combine orange juice, honey and lemon juice and pour it over the fruit. Mix well. Sprinkle with coconut and cover. Chill at least one hour. Toss and garnish with cherries. Serves 6. Can be doubled.

CARROT AND CABBAGE SLAW

2 cups shredded cabbage
1 cup shredded carrots
½ cup raisins
¼ cup slivered almonds, toasted
½ cup Passover mayonnaise
2 teaspoons lemon juice
1/8 teaspoon nutmeg

In a large bowl combine cabbage, carrots, raisins and almonds. In a small bowl, combine the mayonnaise, lemon juice and nutmeg. Pour dressing ovr salad and toss. Serves 6. Can be doubled.

MELON VEGETABLE SALAD

3 cups honeydew, in balls
3 cups watermelon, in balls
1 carrot, coarsely shredded
1 medium cucumber, peeled, quartered, seeded and sliced
½ cup blueberries
½ cup apricot preserves
¼ cup sweet white wine
2 tablespoons orange juice concentrate, thawed

In a large bowl, combine the fruits (except the blueberries) and vegetables. Toss gently. In a small bowl combine the preserves, wine and orange juice. Mix well and pour over the melon mixture. Stir well and cover. Refrigerate until just before serving. Remove from refrigerator, gently stir in the blueberries and serve on salad greens if desired. Serves 10.

HERBED CARROTS AND GRAPES

2 tablespoons margarine or butter
3 cups thinly sliced carrots
½ cup finely chopped onions
3 tablespoons dry wine or water
1 cup seedless red or green grapes, halved, at room temp.
dash of dried dill or thyme
1 tablespoon honey

Melt margarine in a medium skillet. Add the wine or water. Saute the carrots and onions until crisp tender, approx. four to five minutes. Stir occasionally. Remove from heat and add the remaining ingredients. Stir well and cover. Let stand two to three minutes to warm the grapes then serve. Serves 4 to 5. Can be doubled.

SPINACH STUFFED TOMATOES

2 small tomatoes
2 tablespoons margarine
1 teaspoon minced garlic
¼ cup chopped green onions
2 cups shredded fresh spinach
½ teaspoon dried tarragon or basil
1 egg, hard boiled, chopped

Cut the tomato in half. Scoop out the inside and discard it. Set the 4 shells aside. In a large skillet melt margarine and sauté garlic and green onions for about one minute. Stir in the spinach and tarragon or basil. Cook one to two minutes until the spinach starts to wilt. Remove from heat and spoon the spinach mixture into the tomato shell. Sprinkle the chopped egg on top and serve warm. Serves 4. Can be doubled.

HOT FRUITED TEA

5 cups boiling water
4 tea bags
10 whole cloves
¼ teaspoon cinnamon
½ cup sugar
¼ cup lemon juice
½ cup orange juice
orange slices or wedges

Place the tea bags, cloves and cinnamon in a large pan. Pour the boiling water over them and let set steep for five minutes. Strain into a teapot and add the sugar and juices. Heat till simmering and serve hot. Garnish with orange slices. Serves 6.

CHOICES, CHOICES AT PRICE CLUB

For the first time, Price Club's wholesale warehouse at highways 400 and 7 has set up an extensive selection of Passover packaged products. A whole aisle, separate from the regular food department, has been set aside for this service. The foods have been set on pallets which have been covered with cardboard, so the customer can be assured that there is no contact with chometz. The selection ranges from basic cooking ingredients like grape juice, sugar, matzah meal, oil and matzah to chips, juice, mixes, jams and candles.

Healthy eating at Pesach

No time to eat, let alone prepare a nutritious meal? You can eat well on the run, even when busy preparing Pesach, if you make it Nutrition To Go! March is Nutrition Month and dietitians across Canada will be busy offering Canadians advice on how to incorporate nutrition into their busy lives — whenever and wherever they go.

When you're on the go, healthy eating becomes even more important to maintain stamina, but keep the principles of healthy eating in mind. Here are a few tips to get you started:

- Breakfast gives you the energy you need to start a busy day. Get your day off to a good start at home — eat cereal with fruit, scramble eggs in the microwave, drink a blender shake made with fruit and milk or yogurt, or finish the leftovers from the fridge. If there's no time to eat at home, pack something or buy something to eat on the way or once you arrive.
- Stock your office/lunchroom/briefcase with nutritious snacks that you can reach for on those "dining at your desk" days. Some suggestions from dietitians: hard-boiled eggs, fresh fruit, yogurt, crackers, cheese, leaner deli, cereal bars and cartons of milk or juice. Make your snacking choices count! This can be a great way to use up leftovers, too.
- Plan meals ahead of time to make shopping quick and easy. Think about your grocery list while you watch TV, ride the bus or wait in a line.
- Batch cook meals on weekends and freeze. On time-crunched evenings, pull out a frozen chili, spaghetti sauce or stew and microwave. Use leftovers for lunches.
- Keep your freezer and cupboard stocked with frozen vegetables, entrées and canned goods. These will provide short cuts on busy nights when you still want a family sit-down meal.
- Cut up carrots, broccoli, peppers and other vegetables when you have some time and refrigerate — they can be grabbed as a quick snack or quickly stir-fried or steamed as an accompaniment to pasta, rice or meat for a quick and nutritious dinner.
- When time is short, grab a bite while walking to the car or bus, getting ready for work, sitting at your desk or waiting between appointments and in line-ups.
- Dietitians recommend choosing a variety of foods from the four food groups of the Canada Food Guide To Healthy Eating. Choose leaner meats and lower fat dairy products; foods prepared with little or no fat; and more grains, cereals, breads, fruits and vegetables.

Witness the bright colors of Edith Strauss

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Fashion designer Edith Strauss is known for her bright palet. "I do all colors, but on the whole I specialize in bright colors," she says. "No matter what Paris and Milan say, we do our own shades. The mills do color especially for me."

Strauss chooses to work in "high shades" like royal blue, fuchsia and jade because bright colors tend to flatter most women, she says. "It brightens them up. Not every color is right for every person. At a certain age, a woman realizes she can wear certain colors and she asks for them. Canadian women like bright colors."

Creating a new collection twice a year gets her adrenalin working, she says. "There is great pressure to be on time and to be better than the next designer. You have to have an intuitive knowledge of what the Canadian woman is going to want."

And Strauss is certainly well versed in the fashion needs of Canadian women. She has been designing with their needs in mind for more than 40 years. She started as a teenager in Montreal and by her early 20s was the executive designer for the country's largest dress manufacturer.

She launched her own label in 1965, following a move to Toronto when her late husband, Norman, shifted his business here. One of the most established designers in Canada, Strauss has navigated some unchartered fashion territory.

She was the first Canadian designer to sell to Saks Fifth Avenue in the United States and to crack the tough Japanese market. She dreamed up the concept of the executive dress for working women and in 1990 she was the first recipient of the prestigious City of Toronto Award for Excellence in Fashion Design.

The designer – her label can be found in many department stores – says she wouldn't like to be starting her career today because it is a difficult time for the Canadian fashion industry. The last recession wiped out many retail stores reducing the market share for Canadian designers who also face tough competition from imports from the Far East and Europe.

The industry has also been hurt by the grunge look, a general trend in fashion recently. Women who in the past looked to designers for direction have been confused by the "anti-fashion" statements of grunge which teams a chiffon dress cut out in back and front with army boots, she says.

Canadian women tend to choose designers by the cut and fit of the garments rather than by the stature of the designer, she explains. "Once they get accustomed to a certain cut and fit they always come back."

One store tracked their customers' purchases: 380 were consistently buying her label, she says. "They were asking for my name not because I am Edith Strauss but because they feel comfortable in my designs."

For her new spring collection, Strauss is showing linen suits in navy and white and her trademark high shades. A round neck navy jacket with white linen inserts is teamed with a straight white linen skirt which can be worn long or short. A similar white skirt is also shown with a longer round neck navy jacket that buttons on the side.

Straight linen dresses with inserted panels of contrasting colored linen give the dresses a couture look, she notes. "The insert in that dress can only be done by a very experienced craftsman." Her bestseller is an A-line dress in an array of colors and trims with three gold buttons; linen dresses with matching coats or jackets are also an important part of the collection, she says.

For evening, Strauss has created mid-calf gorgette dresses in an array of styles and colors: black dotted on fuchsia and royal backgrounds gathered at the waist or straight dress with a double-flounced flirt skirt. She is also showing a three-piece chiffon ensemble – a pleated skirt, camisol and flowing jacket – in a striking art-deco print as well as a cream-colored cocktail suit with a vest-like jacket in satin-back crepe teamed with a white gorgette circular skirt.

The spring is Strauss' busiest season becuase she is shipping the summer lines and getting the showroom ready for her fall collection. "Every new collection is a challenge. You have to be excellent. You have to be better than the competition to survive."

For her new collection, Strauss is showing Linen Suits in navy and white, and her trademark high shades.

Winners relocates flagship store

Workers apply finishing touches as Winners prepares to move into spacious new quarters at Lawrence Plaza

On Wednesday, March 27, Winners, Canada's largest off-price retailer, will relocate its flagship Lawrence Plaza store. Situated in the same mall, the new store is moving to a second storey location (over Sportmart). The new store will nearly double its original size and feature over 30,000 square feet of first quality, brand label and designer fashions for men, women and children; domestics; and giftware.

Store to double in size

Opened in 1982, the Lawrence Plaza store was the first Winners location. "Because this was our first store and our flagship store, it has always had the strongest and most dedicated customer following. Many of our Lawrence Plaza shoppers are amazed when they hear that we have over 17 more stores in the city, 38 more nationwide!" explains David Margolis, company president.

High fashion, low prices — that's the Winners formula

More famous labels

Picture this: double the Winners, twice as many great gifts

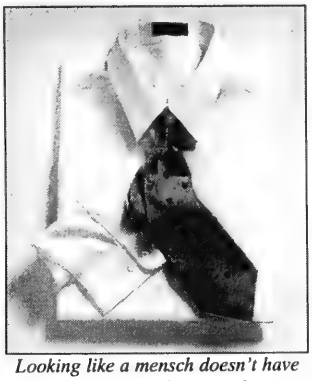
The aggressive expansion plan to take the chain's value message across Canada began in 1990 when the TJX Companies Inc. (parent company of TJ MAXX and Marshalls in the U.S.) acquired Winners. At that time Winners was a five-store Toronto-based chain. With strong, secure financial backing, Winners has been able to take advantage of the immense potential of the off-price market in Canada.

Grand opening Wed. March 27

"Our newer stores are bigger, brighter and more shopable than the original Lawrence Plaza store. Over the past few years we have been looking for a way to improve and expand this location. When this opportunity arose, we jumped at it," says Margolis. "There's going to be more of everything, more famous labels, more great fashion. We're sure our regular customers are going to love it, and we hope to attract new ones too."



*Looking like a mensch doesn't have to be expensive when you shop at Winners

Career dressing's a snap at Winners, with 30,000 square feet of fashions to choose from

Fashion, giftware, and more

The Lawrence Plaza store is located at Lawrence and Bathurst. Store Opening Hours are Monday to Friday 9:30 to 9:00, Saturday 9:30 to 6:00, and Sunday 11:00 to 5:00. For more information, call 1-800-646-WINN.

'Don't spill any on me!'

By PHYLLIS FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

In a dilemma about what to wear to that upcoming function or party? You're tired of the same old thing. You want to look great, make a statement and be different? Then you may want to consider this.

Contrary to the belief some women seem to have that wearing less is more effective, wearing less has actually become so commonplace that in reality, the thrill is gone. Why is it that in this day and age, when women have fought so hard to be recognized as intellectual equals, there has never been so much cleavage displayed at a social event?

Exactly what message are you leaving — or more aptly cleaving — when you wear clothing that leaves nothing much to the imagination? Are you saying, "I really have nothing much to offer, I'm very boring, but in case you haven't noticed, I do have these"? The message you may be sending is: "This is all I have!"

Think about how you really want to be seen before you get dressed for that special evening out. If being the gâteau maison isn't what you had in mind, then maybe you should not display your hidden assets.

The point isn't how beautiful or well-toned one's body is, it's about self-respect and how we regard ourselves.

Mothers of b'nei mitzvah should be especially conscious of how they dress for their own simchah. You can look beautiful, radiant, elegant, fabulous ... but sexy should not be in this particular list. Remember that this is your child's special day and it's up to you to set the tone for the occasion.

Discretion is usually shown at daytime luncheons following synagogue services. However, when it comes to evening parties and dressing options are more varied, some women unfortunately forget where they are going and literally let it all hang out.

They think it's their party and they'll show what they want to. Wrong! Do you really want your daughter's bat mitzvah teacher to be front row centre at your coming out party?

Please use your common sense and save the sexy outfits for another type of occasion, definitely not your son or daughter's bar or bat mitzvah.

To all those who insist on flaunting what they've got, I say, "It may be fine for you if your cup runneth over, but please do me a favor and try not to spill any on me."

Beauty tricks to help you look perfect for your wedding

By CAROL BIRKEN WISE
Special to The CJN

Your wedding day, a day you've dreamed about for years is quickly approaching and you are in tears. Why? You are five pounds overweight, your skin is blotchy and you hate your hair. That is the dilemma of wanting to be perfect for your wedding day! The good news is you are not alone and there are many beauty tricks that can create that perfect beauty for you.

Skin care is your first step. It is a good idea to get a professional opinion and begin your cleansing procedure at least three months prior to your wedding date.

Your diet is important: avoid all caffeine, including chocolate, and drink at least eight glasses of water a day.

Exercise is a great stress reliever. Do it every day. If you don't have time for a full workout, stretch or go for a 20-minute walk.

A great makeup application should be reasonably easy. Enhance your best features and camouflage your less attractive ones. The golden rule is "Less is more."

BEAUTY TIPS

Foundation: Match your skin tone, use a minimal amount and blend well, stopping at your jaw line. Choose a color that is closest to your natural skin tone. Apply loose or pressed powder in a translucent shade, as this will increase wearing power.

Blush: Use a large soft brush and dust high on your cheekbones, blend with a soft sponge. Dry powder blush is the best choice, as it blends well and stays on the longest. The best color choice is rose, which is the most natural.

Eye shadow: Use neutral shades such as taupe, mocha and beige, blend well. Leave the frosting for your cake.

Eye pencils: Apply close to your Enhance your best features.

lash line, blend with a soft sponge or Q-tip to avoid that owl look. The most effective colors are black, grey and brown.

Mascara: The only colors to use are black or brown. Apply lightly and evenly, as mascara clumps are awful in photographs.

Lipstick: The day of your wedding is not a day for change. Choose a lipstick that you love and feel comfortable wearing. The days of ruby red lips are long gone.

My advice is practise, and then practise again. If you are still not happy with your beauty results, it might be a good idea to hire a professional.

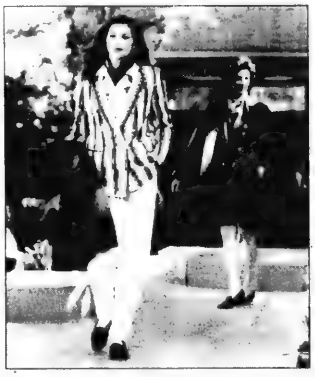
Hazelton Lanes: the very finest in the very heart of Yorkville



Fashion shows are a regular attraction in Hazelton Lanes

At the heart of Bloor-Yorkville, between Avenue Road and Hazelton Avenue, lies what many consider the best indoor shopping in Canada. Hazelton Lanes Shopping Centre opened in 1975 and has grown considerably over the years. "The Lanes," as it is commonly called, is an interesting mix of old and new architectural styles which include winding cobblestone walkways, an enclosed outdoor courtyard and a soaring atrium, which was added in the Lanes' 1989 expansion.

The Lanes is comprised of over 85 specialty and one-of-a-kind retailers, and features Canadian, European, and American fashions for men, women, and children. Designers such as Alfred Sung, Adrienne Vittadini, Gianni Versace and Ralph Lauren are just a few of the top names featured at The Lanes. For casual and everyday wear, stores such as Club Monaco, Tristan, Marci Lipman, Arrow, and Jacob are also available.

Hazelton Lanes also provides a great array of unique shops which sell everything from Cuban cigars to Canadian folk art and exquisite antiques. Be sure to peruse the unusual and "out-of-the-ordinary" accessories at The General Store, or scoop up that elusive recording you've been searching high and low for at The Classical Record Shop. These are just a few of the exclusive and original shops that can be found at Hazelton Lanes.

Father/Daughter Fashion Show Thursday March 28

Hazelton Lanes is also pleased to provide entertaining events such as their first Father/Daughter Fashion Show to be held on Thursday, March 28th at 6:30 p.m. Twenty-five pairs of contestants selected from hundreds of entries will model clothing from participating Hazelton Lanes retailers alongside local Toronto celebrity pairs of fathers and daughters. Among the celebrities participating are Citytv's Ann Rohmer and Kevin Frankish, CFTO's Robin Ward, and CFNY's Humble Howard and Fred Patterson. There is no admission fee and seating is based on a first come first served basis.

The "See & Do Club": a place to learn, a place to play

Children can also find amusing and fun things to do at Hazelton Lanes. Monthly workshops are held in the "See & Do Club" located on the lower level beside Brown's. Children have a great time participating in fun and creative workshops. Upcoming workshops include a sign up class on Saturday, April 13th from 11:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. (each session is 1 1/2 hours in length) that will focus on music and colour theory, and then on Saturday, April 27th there is a drop-in class where the children will create their very own birdfeeder for the spring. For more information or to sign up please call (416) 968-0853. A minimum donation of $2.00 per workshop is required in order to participate, with all the proceeds going to the Hospital for Sick Children, Children with AIDS Fund.

If you're looking for an extra special "perk", be sure to sign up for a Hazelton Lanes Loyalty Card. The card allows you to receive extras such as 3 hours of free parking (with minimum $10.00 purchase), discounts, reserved seating for special events and gifts with purchase from participating retailers. All of this is listed in the bi-monthly newsletter you'll receive once you've signed up. Be sure to sign up for your card at the Customer Service Centre.

For more information about Hazelton Lanes and its events or shops, all you have to do is call (416) 968-0853 and one of their friendly customer service staff will be pleased to assist you.

The Village Shop Plus enters spring with colourful attitude

Fresh, vibrant colour and a host of lightweight novelty fabrics highlight a spring renaissance at The Village Shop Plus. Along with the basic-colour knits that are still a staple of your workwear diet, you'll find blouses, pants and jackets in exciting new feather-weight blends of wool, silk, linen and viscose, in pastel blue, powder blue, and banana yellow. Fresh, clean hues to spruce up your day wardrobe. Properly coordinated, they'll put to shame the uniformed look of seasons past, while still commanding the respect a professional environment demands.

Continuing The Village Shop's tradition, buyer Beverley Lerner has personally sought out the finest offerings of the European market. Among her new acquisitions for The Village Shop Plus is Samoon, a sporty new line featuring fluid dressing, soft fabrics, and some delicious tunic tops. It all spells Comfort with a capital "C", and these pieces will blend seamlessly with your existing wardrobe, adding depth and versatility.

If you love the look of blue denim but not its feel or presentation, The Village Shop Plus is ready and waiting for you with a heavenly denim line made of tencel, a lightweight, ultracomfortable fabric that maintains the textured look of denim without its stiffness, and lends itself to a dressier style suitable for any office environment. It also dyes beautifully and will "coral" your world if blue is already well-represented in your wardrobe.

The finely tailored clothing which has always defined The Village Shop Plus is still there in force; the suits and jackets you require for more formal corporate dressing are ever-present, in the size you require.

Darren Mason, who operates the store with Ms. Lerner, has seen a general return to image dressing for work, though this has always been a prime focus of The Village Shop Plus. "The range of options is much broader than in the past," he says, "but with this greater freedom comes an increased responsibility to coordinate properly." The importance of presentation cannot be overemphasized, according to Mason: "The bottom line is that when you look good, you feel good, and this impacts directly on your performance and on how your colleagues and associates perceive you." Inner confidence and outward appearance are interdependent, says Mason: "You might be able to dissociate them at home, but in the workplace the reality factor kicks in. The positive feedback you get on what you're wearing may seem superficial until you don't get it; then it seems very important indeed."

Conway and Gower a gift giver's paradise

Losing yourself in Hazelton Lanes can be fun — especially if you happen to find yourself in the friendly confines of Conway and Gower, a wonderful "furniture" shop that carries "Everything for the dining room but the food". "Everything" in this case means English and European china, crystal, Irish and French linens, oil paintings, watercolours, prints, and many other items. If it will enhance your home, chances are it's at Conway and Gower, tucked invitingly into some little nook.

It's a gift-giver's paradise, and with the help of Proprietor Hilary Jones, you'll find yourself scooping up the perfect birthday, wedding or anniversary gift in a matter of minutes. For as little as $10 or as much as $12,000, Conway and Gower can satisfy any gift-giving need. Bridal registry is a specialty, and Conway and Gower offers 10% off all pre-wedding registry purchases and gives the couple a gift both on their wedding day and on their first anniversary.

Warm personal service and free gift wrapping, storage and local delivery are all the more reason to visit this charming niche. Conway and Gower can deliver your gift worldwide. Phone and mail orders are accepted to assist out-of-town guests.

In fine china, Conway and Gower carries several renowned lines, including Richard-Ginori, to grace your dining room table. They'll also be happy to supply the table itself; their showroom always has a select few exquisite antique dining tables fit for a regal feast.

This is not a mass-merchandising environment, but a special place where items are selected lovingly, one by one.

Crabtree & Evelyn: goodness through & through

Scarcely do you set foot in Crabtree & Evelyn than you are enveloped by sights and scents evocative of a simpler — and in its simplicity, richer — time.

Based on the old English stillroom, used to store the fruits and flowers of the fall harvest, the Crabtree & Evelyn shops reflect the architectural design of the store on Kensington Church Street in London, England. They operate on a simple but compelling formula: purveying everything that's good for the body, both inside and out.

In this case, the "goodness" is through-and-through; all products are made slowly, painstakingly, often by hand, with no animal testing. Soaps, triple-milled, are fragrant to the core; preserves (three different kinds of strawberry, and several sugar-free varieties sweetened with apple juice) are hand-cooked in copper kettles and hand-bottled with no preservatives; and some of the pure butter biscuits are actually yellower in the summer because the cattle who cooperated in making them are meadow-grazed at that time of year!

Soothing skin care products abound, from the La Source line of aromatherapeutic bath gels, moisturizers, Dead Sea and epsom salts to the ever-popular Goatsmilk collection of soaps, body creams, and gels. Luxurious fragrances for the home include hand-crafted potpourri, scented drawer lining papers and perfumed candles.

Complementing the range of comestibles are fine teas, chocolates, and a mouthwatering variety of exotically-flavoured biscuits, notably orange and lemon. There are some incredibly quaint gift items, including DuBarry collector boxes from Limoges, France (see the shoe-shaped box pictured below) and the hand-made sterling silver Yard-O-Led pen (a perennial favourite as a bar mitzvah gift) recently featured on Venture.

Toiletries for men and women include such items as brushes made by hand (literally, bristle by bristle!) and bath and shaving ensembles that make a perfect gift for almost any occasion. Giftwrapping is free.

The shops derive their name from George Crabtree and John Evelyn, two renowned 17th century horticulturalists and naturalists. Some of their notes are reproduced on the packaging of a few of Crabtree and Evelyn's fine products.

The sensory pleasure of a visit to Crabtree and Evelyn is further enhanced by the presence of friendly, knowledgeable staff. Owners Sam and Rosemarie Goldenberg and manager Jennifer are easygoing, gentle people whose spirit of service embodies the ethos of the products that line their shelves.

Versatility, colour keynote Andrew's spring lineup

Updating and augmenting Andrew's stellar complement of traditional sportswear this season are some exciting twists on old themes.

Remember the pants suit? It's back in a big way, with an important difference. Add a jacket, and it carries effortlessly to evening; subtract the pants and add a skirt — knee-length or below the knee — and it is evening.

Navy still captains the colour fleet, but now it's got company: a resplendent array of bright yellows, mints, emeralds, and fuschias are ready to spell it at a moment's notice. A fresh tropical breeze of orange, citron yellow and lime green underscores the festival of colour that is Spring '96.

In this rainbow-like setting, it's not surprising that companion whites seem crisper, more radiant. Even classical black-and-whites have put on a fresh face, with innovative, novelty checks more commonly associated with fall popping up everywhere in lightweight, eminently wearable fabrics.

All shine and no rain being a Utopian concept, the real world (i.e. Canada) sees Andrew's transcend the simple trenchcoat with a glittering array of rainwear in irridescent shades of silver, gold and bronze.

Among Andrews' hot new fashion-forward Italian imports, MK has carved an impressive niche. Furthering the Italian-inspired clean, fluid look is the increasingly popular option to support your suit or blazer with knits as opposed to blouses. It's all about choice and the ability to dress down within acceptable limits, yours being the freedom to determine just where those boundaries lie. There's a caveat, however: know thyself well enough to know what co-ordinates. Or better yet, rely on Andrew's expert staff to know thyself!

This trend towards the relaxed is reflected not only in sportswear, but throughout the store. In the lingerie department, microfibre has emerged as a fabric of choice for its comfort-enhancing properties. In cosmetics, clean, pure, natural colours are coming to the fore, with all eyes on eyes this season.

For its customers, the Andrew's advantage lies in the fact that it is one of a very few Canadian stores whose buyer (Beverley Lemer) still personally scours the European market in search of the styles that best define and exemplify the seasons. That she does likewise for the American market makes Andrew's rarer still. "We're not limited to one market, nor are we slaves to a single designer," she says. "Whatever speaks to us and measures up to our standards of value, quality, style, and versatility will find its way into our shop."

Mondi's Spring '96 features new sporty

New directions. Mondi's City Collections have been joined by three complete Activewear Collections offering natural, comfortable chic with freedom for active lifestyles.

- Sporty colour-blocking styles in cotton and poly/cotton/lycra — easy to wear, easy to care for.
- Sweat shirts, leggings, bermudas and T-shirts in navy, red, and yellow, as well as pink & black and cream & black.

Ever the frontrunner in clean, classic sportswear, Mondi has unveiled a spring '96 collection that underscores this reputation with several key ingredients:

- Building on the nostalgic inspiration of the 1940's, Mondi brings the world of "cruising to Europe for the first time" back to life with the elegant yet sporty "tennis club" influence. The colour club's classic navy and red welcomes enthusiastic new members turquoise and yellow.
- Coming into the fabric fold is a new wool/poly mixture of crêpe piqué, a lovely lightweight addition that braves spring breezes and summer sun with equal panache.
- The beautiful, clean pant lines you've come to expect from Mondi are out in full force with a twofold advantage: straight leg and slim for an alluring silhouette, yet with built-in stretch for comfort.
- Suits — a Mondi signature — are at once classic yet fresh as a breeze, some sporting twists with Jackie 'O' inspiration that make them a wonderfully versatile addition to your wardrobe. In the boardroom or on deck — suit yourself!
- After many requests, Mondi now offers a collection of "Fashion Classics" that include favourites such as navy jackets, stretch denim jeans, fine cotton T-shirts and silk blouses — even a Mondi Fashion Classics Teddy bear, wearing a navy blazer! It's all waiting for you at Mondi Boutiques in Hazelton Lanes and four other convenient locations.

Originally Canadian company also a Hazelton Lanes original

How do two young men parlay a love of nature into a multinational retail empire spanning several continents? Marsha Sinetar might say that they "did what they loved, and the rest followed." In a Nathaniel Hawthornish way, Michael Budman and Don Green, the co-founders of Roots, allowed the butterfly of business success to alight on their shoulders by not pursuing it too vigorously.

The company's humble beginnings — and the name Roots — are the first clues that this is not your typical in-your-face-dollar-driven success story. Rather, it's the outgrowth of a childhood friendship and a love of the outdoors. The love came first; the money followed.

Out of days spent in the pristine woods of Camp Tamakwa in Algonquin Park — a Jewish day camp recently eulogized in the movie Indian Summer — grew a desire to translate their love of nature into something tangible that their peers could relate to. The results — from the original negative heel "earth" shoe through the myriad of products for men, women and children that now comprise the Roots product line — reflect an uncanny ability to tap the pulse of consumers with active lifestyles. Roots' dramatic corporate growth ("corporate" being an oxy-moron in this case, since "suits" are noticeably absent from Team Roots) has seen it supplement its contingent of some 95 Canadian stores with openings in the Far East and major American centres such as Chicago, Detroit, Aspen, San Francisco, and Beverly Hills.

The Hazelton Lanes store is one of a very few that can trace its roots back to the opening of The Lanes in 1973.

Unlike many modern retail chains in which the marketing concept often precedes not only the opening of stores but even the manufacture of product, the company's evolution has always been predicated on the response of the people who actually use its products. Employing some 1,000 Canadians and utilizing some 180,000 square feet of state-of-the-art production facilities right here in Toronto, Roots is at this very moment busily preparing goods for shipment to Roots stores in Hazelton Lanes and around the world.

And, unlike many big companies, says Budman, Roots is answerable not to shareholders but "directly to our customers." Likewise, new product decisions are based not on what some ivory-tower brain trust thinks may twig the market, but on which product samples Budman, Green and their spouses like enough to use themselves every day.

As Toronto Life commented in its October 1993 issue, Budman and Green " . . . have turned what might have been just another clothing chain into a legitimate cultural icon." Indeed, so ubiquitous are Roots' wears that they have come to be almost as much a part of the Canadian landscape as the environment they revere. Roots products are everywhere. Such is their popularity that, in addition to the casual settings where you'd expect to find them, it's not uncommon to see people wearing a Roots sweatshirt in the workplace or even — gasp! — the boardroom. Or, to put it another way — do you know anyone who doesn't wear Roots — sometime, somewhere?

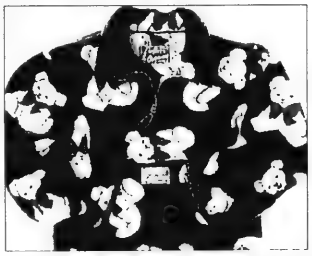
Among the new offerings from Roots for spring '96 are a new line of stylish leather jackets and some fabulous new bags made of "the world's finest water-repellant nylon," according to Budman.



From jackets to ball caps to bags and everything in between, Roots' products generally feature the clever interplay of leather and fabric, marrying sport and fashion in a way that transcends both.

Roots is also an active player in the charity field, supporting among many other causes the United Jewish Appeal, the Children's Wish Fund, the Hospital for Sick Children, the Sunrise Youth Group, Variety Village, and the David Suzuki Foundation. Obviously, two important elements in the genesis of Roots — childhood and the environment — have not been not forgotten.

As Roots moves towards the twenty-first century, Budman promises that it will continue to go forward by going back — to its roots.

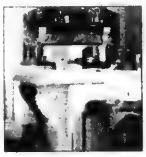
Yorkville Design Centre boasts impressive credentials

From their charming Hazelton Lanes showroom that portrays, in microcosm, the kind of design taste that graces their award-winning residential and commercial interiors, the Yorkville Design Centre offers home and office planners a one-stop solution to their space-planning and decorative needs.

In a 25-year history that has seen them serve a devoted clientele not only from Toronto but all over the United States, their work can now be seen in homes and office buildings in New York, California, Connecticut, and numerous other locales across North America. Partners Jo Goebel and Barbara Munn, who have been on board for the past 17 years, can also lay claim to being Toronto's oldest dealer of Downsview Kitchens, a name synonymous with quality.



So strong is YDC's reputation for kitchens, however, that some people are unaware of its real forté, namely space planning and interior design.

The consultation begins with an interview so thorough that even veterans of the process are impressed. "We ask a lot of thought-provoking questions," says Barbara. "Long before we get into any specifics about design elements, we talk about the lifestyle you want and the environment you envision. We merge the house in your head with the house in your heart; then we put it on paper."

Herein lies another advantage of dealing with YDC: your dream home (or kitchen, or bedroom, or office) is hand-sketched, often before your very eyes, in a warm, realistic three-dimensional rendering that puts you right inside the space in a way that a computer rendering or a cross-section simply cannot.

The fees charged by YDC are surprisingly affordable for a firm whose work has graced the pages of Towne and Country, Chatelaine and Toronto Life. "Working with budgets is part and parcel of the design process," says Barbara. "We pride ourselves on being able to find solutions that fit, financially as well as architecturally." The range of services offered is broad, from decorating a single bedroom to designing an entire house or office building. And their expertise is second to none; as stated in a recent issue of Toronto Life, Yorkville Design Centre has "... a fine tradition of craftsmanship as well as style," and is "probably the finest kitchen department of any supplier [of Downsview Kitchens] in the city."

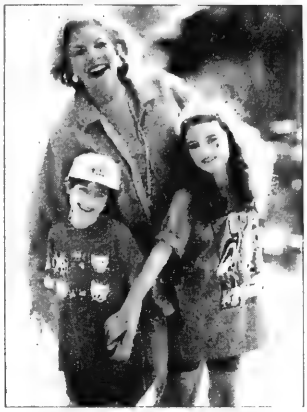
New fabrics, same old comfort from Marci Lipman

For spring '96 Marci Lipman features a new Signature Collection with innovative fabrics that add a new, more sophisticated dimension to her line without taking away any of the comfort her clothes are famous for.



Marci Lipman's feel-good apparel knows no age boundaries

Front and centre in this "renaissance" is tencel, nature's newest luxury fibre. It looks just like denim, but is much softer and drapes beautifully. The dresses, skirts, pants, shorts, and vests that have resulted will make a comfortable, useful and washable addition to your spring wardrobe.

Another first for Marci this spring is a rayon program featuring a beautiful garden flower print. This rayon is fully washable and feels fabulous. Soft yet cool, it's the perfect thing to have next to your skin on those transitional spring/summer days and evenings. This grouping offers a multitude of mix and match possibilities, and is also available in youth sizes.

Pure cotton continues to be a Marci Lipman forté, and this spring you can look forward to a number of hot new items and yummy colours. A highlight among Marci's sporty casuals is a flat back rib cotton group which includes an embroidered crop jacket, a crop T shirt and matching pants.

In terry cotton — a new program for Marci Lipman — there's a button-front overshirt, crew T, shorts, miniskirt, and tank dress. Especially inviting are the solid colour T shirts in raspberry, sage, and periwinkle highlighted by small, subtle prints, which team up beautifully with matching leggings and bicycle shorts. There's a new garden series of T shirts decorated with wildflowers and hummingbirds. Also included in this series is the "Ladybug" design by Canadian artist Ruth Adler Dayan, now living in Israel.

The Marci Lipman chain is now eight stores strong, with the latest store having opened recently in the Promenade Mall at Bathurst and Centre.

Of course, the traditional casual wear and sleepwear you've come to know and love is still very much in evidence, as are the animal prints that made the Marci Lipman line famous. Whether shopping for yourself, your better half, your children or your grandchildren, you do so in the knowledge that you're giving the gift of comfort.

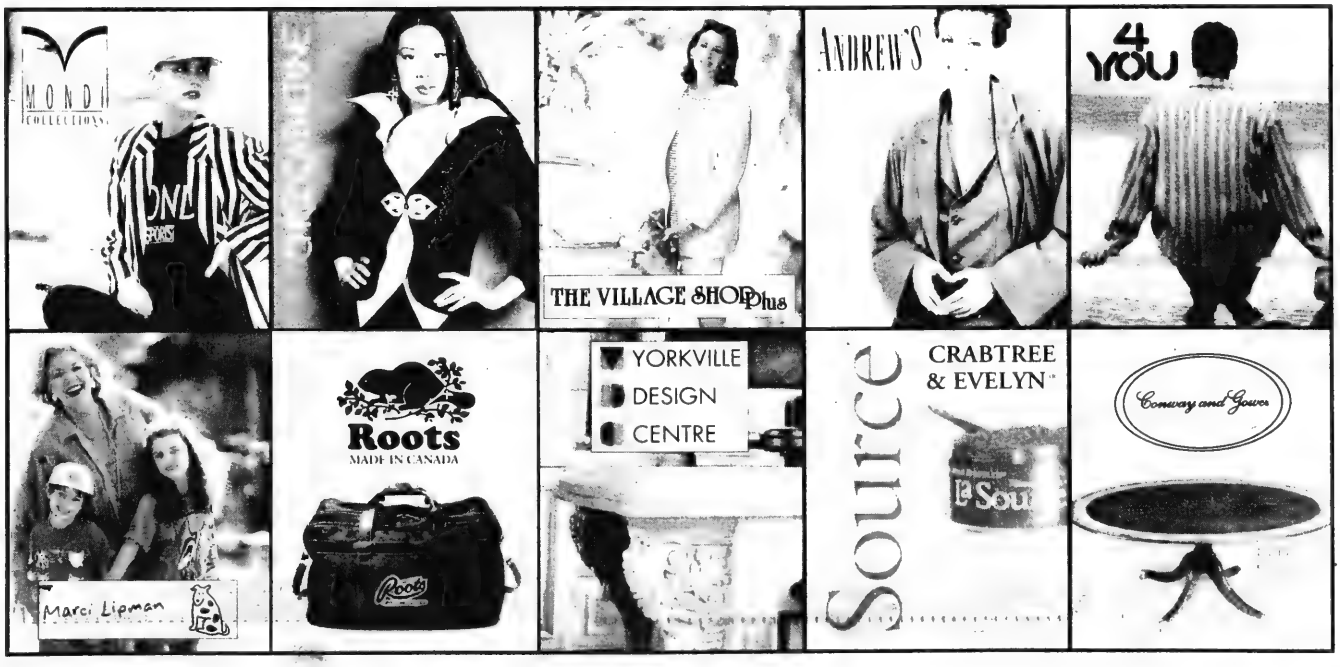
HAZELTON LANES – THERE'S NO OTHER PLACE QUITE LIKE IT



Spring Fashion

Beauty SHOP

By Carol Birken-Wise

Spring '96 splashes forward with palettes of color and a collection of styles. Whether you fancy clear red lipstick or mod beige, you will be considered in the height of fashion. A word of advice, though. If you are wearing a lady-like black dress with an elegant strand of pearls, don't wear mod beige lipstick with purple eye shadow. Makeup should be in keeping with your clothes.

As the weather becomes warm and humid, change your winter cleansing routine. Treat yourself to a professional facial, and welcome spring with a sparkling clean face.

Skin Care

A velvety and youthful complexion can be a dream come true. Learn what type of skin you have before purchasing cleansing or moisturizing products.

Chanel: new, four superb cleansing and moisturizing products. Douceur Lactee is a cleansing milk for the face and eye area. It has a light, milky texture and leaves an invisible moisturizing and protective film on the skin. It is best for normal to dry skin types. Aquamousse Fraicheur is a foaming cleanser to be used with water. It neutralizes drying effects of water and moisturizes the skin. It is good for all skin types. It is great for the woman who likes the feeling of soap and water. Lotion Fraiche, with its low percentage of alcohol, tightens pores, tones and soothes the skin. Pure Reponse is a light-textured emulsion that will leave your skin radiant through the day and night.

Bobbi Brown: Exfoliating Face Wash sloughs off dead skin cells, thus uncovering a more youthful appearing skin. Exfoliation is essential. Do it once or twice a week depending on your skin type. It is well worth the effort.

Foundation

Foundation will help you create that sought after, flawless finish. It will also protect your skin from the environment and most often provide a SPF sun block. Choose a color that matches your natural skin shade, and always apply a pressed or loose powder for longer wearing action.

Lancome: Maquilumine, a new cream powder foundation, promises to fade fine lines and wrinkles. Its whisper-light texture creates a non-oily veil of color. Thanks to the inclusion of lumi-spheres, the reflection of light is modified, resulting in an even complexion erasing signs of fatigue. Lancome, Poudre Majeur is a lighter than air, micro-bubble formula that imparts a fine imperceptible matte finish. It is oil free, yet never drying.

Chanel: Teint Extreme Lumiere formulation is like a skin care cream. Along with light corrective pigments, its rich creamy texture gives dry or sensitive skin a new lease on life.

Blush

Using the best makeup brushes should be equally as important as using the best makeup products. Try M.A.C. brushes for a superior result.

Lancome: Blush Subtil provides soft and subtle color that lasts for hours. This blush-on is oil free, oil absorbing, moisture-balanced and perfect for all skin types. New shade this spring is Lilas, similar to the color of lilacs.

Hair

Hair designer, Daniel Fiorio, says, "The mad for mod movement is still strong, but it's now more about creating a look for the modern age, instead of riding a purely retro wave. For short, medium or longer lengths, longer layers still rule. Shapes are fresh and clean."

Eyes

Make you eyes sparkle with spring's spectacular color collections. Lancome offers three sensational quartets of color, with different combos of pastel and bronze shades. For a touch of fantasy, add a line of Crayon Khol Blanc (Lancome). Bobbi Brown, introduces two fabulous colors. Shell, a soft shade of pink, can be worn on the whole lid or just under the brow bone. Sable, a milk chocolate brown, blends beautifully with shell to create a soft and natural look. It can also be used with a brow brush, as a contour blush or to add depth to the crease.

Lips

With an abundance of colors to choose from, you will be fashionable whether your favorite color is rouge noir (red black) or silver gloss. The trendiest newsmakers are shine and gloss.

Lancome: Rouge Sensation Naif has a stunning pink-hued shine. It will make your lips look quite voluptuous and the shine will stay all day. To enliven any lipstick, try Sorbet De Lancome, a gloss that glistens.

Chanel: Rouge Noir Nail Enamel is joined this season by the equally dramatic Rouge Noir Creme Lipstick. Another exciting introduction is Levres Cristallines/Crystal Lip Gloss, two exciting lip effects, a silvery metallic and pearly shine embedded in a stunning compact, creating a luscious opalescent mouth. This new silver lining lip wear is accompanied by Le Vernis Fluorine/Metallic (nail enamel), which dries rapidly and definitely imparts a long lasting and intense shine.

Fragrance

Paloma Picasso, a new scent, is a breeze of light floral and fruity notes. It has smoldering femininity and freshness that feature lily of the valley, osmanthus and apricot.

Spring brings choices galore for fashion shoppers

By CAROL BIRKEN WISE
Special to The CJN

Spring bursts into motion with glam queen veracity. Whether you choose to emulate Audrey Hepburn or Marilyn Monroe, you will be right in vogue. From hourglass to mini-skirts, fitted jackets to swing coats the choice is yours.

The spring runways are filled with absolutely everything. Black and white are still the most prominent, but many designers showed a full spectrum of color ranging from bold turquoise to flaming red.

Brian Bailey showed numerous pastel shades, such as, peach, yellow and mauve. Bailey's line was the ultimate in femininity. His clothes are sensibly wearable for women of all sizes.

A tribute to Wayne Clark, who after a few years has proven himself once again to be the Dean of Glamor. His evening collection was filled with simple columns; however, his show-stopper was a strapless gown of black and white polka-dot silk with a full crinoline cascading skirt. Clark's designs are comfortable, sexy and fun to wear.

Linda Lundstrom makes fashion and comfort synonymous. Her color story is sumptuous pastels and her styles suit women from all walks of life. Designs are generously cut for easy wear and all items easily mix and match to make your wardrobe fun and versatile.

Comrags clothes are for the young woman with a modern attitude toward style. Their designs are witty, with a tough modern sensibility. Most of their fabrics are soft, flowing and often see through, quite frankly, a look for someone who wants to reveal all her "assets." Their styling is decidedly eclectic and unique.

Wayne Clark's designs are comfortable and fun to wear.

Minimalism is in the air at all fashion centres, but it is definitely the motto of fashion designer Ron Leal, tossing aside all decorative touches, leaving the clothes simple and easy to mix and match. His line is a complete lifestyle, meaning that evening and casual clothes work together. For example, a sequined tank top can be worn with a pair of jeans. Just a few garments creatively put together will take you to many different occasions.

Finally you can dress to suit your body shape and not look like last year's news. The spring designer collections are comfortable, feminine and often sexy, highlighting the brightest designing talents in Canada today.

Euphoric state of relaxation

By CAROL BIRKEN WISE
Special to The CJN

Expert therapists smooth warm lavender oil over your body, soothing aching muscles and releasing sensual energies. Fitness instructors, registered dietitians, psychologists, and even psychic readers, cater to your every need. Tasty low fat meals nourish your body as it shrinks in size. Surrounded by luxurious decor, your body and soul are guided to a euphoric state of healthful relaxation. Welcome to the world of spa living — where, for the right price, all things are possible.

Spas today are indeed more health oriented than ever. I recently visited two in the southern United States and one in Canada with a full range of services.

I began at the Healthwinds Day Spa in midtown Toronto. Featuring a variety of esthetic, therapeutic and stress relief treatments, this little hideaway is a gem.

Thalassotherapy, a mouthful to pronounce, is their signature treatment. It begins with an invigorating exfoliant body scrub, followed by a hydrotherapy bath enriched with marine algae and essential oils.

Along the way, a therapist massages the tension from your muscles with a water-wand that stimulates the lymphatic system and assists in the elimination of cellulite. There are fitness classes, nutrition consultations, dining and even cooking instruction in their private cafe. After five hours of being pampered from head to toe, I felt stress free and totally rejuvenated. Package rates begin at $100, with all services available a la carte.

My next stop was The Bonaventure Spa in Ft. Lauderdale, Fla. Nestled amidst 1,250 lush, subtropical acres, it has been acclaimed by the 1995 Zagat Survey as one of the "Best Values" amongst the Top 10 U.S. spas.

Tanya Lee, the facilities director, describes it more succinctly: "The Bonaventure is a necessity that masquerades as a luxury." After four glorious days there, I can fully agree.

The fitness supervisor, Kristen Felty, is one of the reasons. She actively motivates men and women to make exercise part of their life. Felty teaches her clients to work at their "Target Zone," which means working at 65 to 85 percent of their maximal heart rate. She believes this will maximize the effectiveness of their workout.

I realized that to get a fat burning and conditioning workout I should take this woman's advice. Classes and instruction were available all day, and the results were well worth my effort.

"Weight must be lost the way it was gained, otherwise it will be gained the way it was lost," according to the Bonaventure's registered dietitian, Jennifer Anderson. How true. We all know quick fix diets just don't work.

Among the all-day pampering and myriad body treatments offered by Bonaventure, the most popular is their Hungarian Kur Treatment which begins with a deep cleansing scrub, followed by a private whirlpool featuring Hungarian Kur crystals, and finally a luxurious application of aromatherapy oils mixed with thermal Crystal Body Creme. The body is then wrapped for 20 minutes to allow absorption.

It relieves tension and dry skin, and supposedly promotes detoxification. It's enough to make you shout, "Hallelujah I'm born again."

The Bonaventure Mini Perfect Day rate is $99 U.S., with two night packages starting at $175, based on double occupancy. Rates go down in off season.

The Spa at Doral in Miami, Fla., is in a class all its own. Described by the management as a whole-world spa resort, it combines the best state-of-the-art American fitness techniques with old-world European soothing treatments.

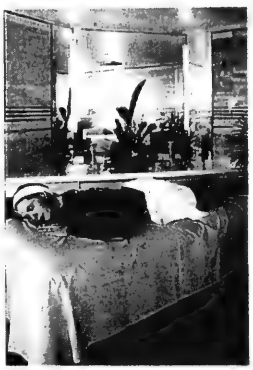
The facilities are surrounded by formal gardens, splashing fountains, tournament quality golf courses and the Arthur Ashe Tennis Centre — definitely world class.

In the spa, you'll find vaulted ceilings, luxuriously appointed suites, cascading waterfalls to sit under, spiral staircases and physical and esthetic comforts galore.

Jossie Feria, the spa director, says, "The Doral is not a boot camp operation. We are results oriented and our goal is repeat business. We get people thinking healthy and design a take home program to keep them that way."

Debbie Daley, registered dietitian, works closely with the chef designing menus that are low in calories and fat.

Daley designs programs integrated with a wellness instructor to suit guests' individual needs. According to Daley, the red licorice I love had to go.



Relaxing with a mudwrap.

Fitness classes begin at 7 a.m. with walks through the Doral's beautiful grounds, and continue until 5 p.m. From Tai Chi to the cardio-circuit, the choice is yours. Instructors are available to guide you at all times. Results will depend on how much effort you are willing to exert.

The Doral Spa Renewal Day is $99, with their two-night Grande Getaway Plan starting at $650 based on double occupancy. Again, rates go down in off season.

Whether your spa experience is for a week, a day or a few hours, it is possible to find a spa that catches your interests and budget. Spas now offer shorter stays that are as affordable as they are tempting. So, get out that piggy bank, because your health is your best investment.

Green Notes environmentally-friendly line

By CAROL BIRKEN WISE
Special to The CJN

The textile industry is making efforts to reduce pollution by introducing fabrics made using environmentally-friendly methods. One example, designer Linda Lundstrom, has created a label called "Green Notes," which she incorporates into each of her collections.

"As a manufacturing company, we feel very strongly that we must take responsibility for our own actions when it comes to environmental issues," Lundstrom says. "The processing, dyeing and finishing of fabrics often uses harsh chemicals. Even natural fibres are often treated with pesticides and chemicals, contributing to the pollution of our waters, especially in countries where pollution controls are not enforced. We attempt to find environmentally safe fabrics and use them in our line."

Linda Lundstrom Ltd. is one of the first Canadian companies to try a new fabric called Tencel, supplied in Canada by Doubletex.

Tencel is a natural cellulosic fibre produced from wood pulp harvested from replenished tree farms. The fabric is made using a solvent spinning technique, in which the dissolving agents are recycled. The process emits no pollutants and the resulting fabric is soft, light and has a wonderful fluidity.

Dresses, skirts and pants made of Tencel are in Lundstrom's Green Notes collection for spring. Her spectacular color story is created using dyes that are environmentally friendly.

One of the Green Notes fabrics is an Austrian linen that is bleached using ash, a natural and very old method. The resulting pearly white parchment color is one of the many initiatives that reflects Lundstrom's commitment to being environmentally responsible.

Remember singer Joni Mitchell's song in which she asks farmers to put away their DDT because she'd rather have spots on her apples than harm the birds and the bees? Since the fabric, Tencel, was produced from wood pulp harvested from replenished tree farms and the technique used recycles all dissolving agents, it only made sense to use environmentally-safe dyes, but like spots on the apples, irregularities in the color are unavoidable.

Linda Lundstrom and the textile industry have proven themselves committed to the environment. Now, it is up to us to do our part. I know a few imperfections in color won't bother me; in fact, they could make the fabrics more interesting.

Linda Lundstrom's new line is environmentally-friendly.

Fashion show for arthritis

The second Flower Pots and Fruit Slices fashion show is being held on March 27 at the Manulife Centre, 55 Bloor St. W, Toronto, at 7 p.m.

The show is organized by the Arthritis Society. It will highlight the spring women's fashions of Canadian designer Ross Mayer. Evening apparel is provided by Wayne Clark and Winston Designs.

The men's collection will be presented by Joseph Abboud, a leader in men's fashion, C.K. Calvin Klein, Mani, Valentino, Strellson (a new Swiss line) and Baulmer fashions from Austria. Outfits will be modelled by Elite Models Management. There will also be a silent auction and raffle tickets.

Tickets cost $75 and a tax receipt will be issued. To buy tickets call Doug Hawe at (416) 967-1414.

MARINATED VEGETABLE SALAD

Salad:
2 cups cauliflower florets
2 cups broccoli florets
8 medium brussel sprouts, quartered (¼ lb.)
12 small mushrooms
6 cherry tomatoes
3 green onions, chopped
2 medium carrots, cut into julienne strips
1 stalk celery, chopped

Dressing:
¾ cup vegetable oil
¼ cup Passover white wine vinegar
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 clove garlic, minced
1 tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. dried oregano
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

In large glass bowl, combine all salad ingredients.

In jar with tight-fitting lid, combine all dressing ingredients. Shake well. Pour over salad and toss well. Cover and chill for 24 hours, stirring occasionally. Makes 6 servings.

minutes and stir. Add the chicken and cilantro and toss gently. Place in the serving dish, sprinkle with nuts and serve. Serves 4 to 6.

PINEAPPLE PECAN LOAF

¾ cup packed brown sugar
¼ cup kosher shortening
1 egg
2 cups flour
1 tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. salt
⅓ cup orange juice
1 can (8¼ oz.) crushed pineapple, undrained
½ cup chopped pecans

Preheat oven to 350. Grease only the bottom of a loaf pan. Cream together the brown sugar and shortening until fluffy. Beat in egg. Stir in flour, baking soda, salt and orange juice. Stir in pineapple (with syrup) and pecans. Spread in pan. Bake approximately 55 minutes or until toothpick comes out clean. Cool slightly and remove from pan. Cool completely before slicing.

SQUASH AND APPLE SOUP
(Foodland Ontario)

Ontario Winter Squash provides the creamy consistency of this delicious golden-hued soup rather than high-calorie cream or flour. Serve it either hot or cold with a green salad.

1 squash, small butternut or acorn (about 1½ lb)
1 tbsp margarine
1 onion, chopped
1 tsp grated fresh ginger root
2 apples, peeled and chopped
2½ cups chicken stock
½ tsp dried thyme leaves
Salt and pepper
Chopped parsley

Peel squash, chop and measure 3 cups squash.

In large saucepan, melt margarine over medium heat. Add onion and ginger and cook until softened, about three to four minutes, stirring constantly. Add chopped squash, apples, chicken stock and thyme. Bring to a boil, reduce heat, cover and simmer until squash is tender, about 20 minutes.

Remove from heat and puree in batches in food processor or blender until smooth. Return to pot and heat gently until hot. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Garnish each serving with chopped parsley.

Matzah cookbook sure to surprise the best cooks

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Believed to be the only cookbook in the world dedicated solely to matzah with recipes for Passover as well as all year round, Matza 101 is filled with recipes that are sure to surprise even the seasoned cook.

Beautiful illustrations, helpful hints, historical backgrounds and diagrams accompany the easy-to-follow instructions for hors d'oeuvre, entrees, side dishes — fish, kugels, casseroles, meat, poultry and numerous desserts for both novice and gourmet cooks.

Created by Jenny Kdoshim and Debbie Bevars, all the recipes in Matza 101 contain unleavened bread — naturally fat-free, yeast-free products — with a smorgasbord of recipes including such favorites as baklava, blintzes, cannolis, knishes, lasagna, pizza pockets, Napoleons and cigars.

"This cookbook involves a process that allows matzah the freedom of manipulation, and then used in our sweet and savory recipes," says Kdoshim. She notes that the book has been very successful throughout the United States in gift shops and Judaica bookstores.

Kdoshim and Bevans also publish newsletters and they are currently in production of an instructional video tape.

Matza 101 is available at Jewish bookstores or write to Matza 101, 11785 Mt. Wilson Court, Alta Loma, California, 91737 or call 909-989-4244, fax 909-466-7628.

MATZAH BROCCOLI CHEESE CASSEROLE

For a light vegetable casserole, try this, especially with the broccoli. We had fun with this in that it was easy to put together and it came out delicious. You can use either fresh broccoli or frozen, but we preferred fresh. If you are going to use fresh, parboil broccoli for about five minutes and be sure not to overcook.

- 4½ cups broccoli flowerettes, parboiled
- 1 cup sour cream
- 1 cup cottage cheese
- 1 cup hand cracked matzah
- ¼ cup margarine, melted
- 2 eggs
- 1 large tomato, thinly sliced
- ½ cup grated Passover Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven 350 degrees.

Lightly grease 9 x 4 x 2 baking dish. Spread broccoli flowerettes in dish. In medium size mixing bowl, beat sour cream, cottage cheese, margarine and eggs until well blended. Fold in cracked matzah and pour mixture over broccoli. Arrange tomato slices on top and sprinkle with Parmesan cheese. Bake in preheated oven for about 45 minutes.

Be sure to let casserole cool for about five minutes before serving. Yield: 8 servings.

MATZAH BEEF 'N' POTATO TURNOVERS

- 12 prepared matzahs (moistened)
- ½ stick margarine, softened
- 1 tbsp. oil
- 2 cups onion, chopped
- 2 cups canned mushrooms, drained
- 1 lb. lean ground beef
- 2 medium potatoes, mashed with one tbsp. margarine
- ½ tsp. garlic powder
- ½ tsp. onion powder

Salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven 450 degrees.

Grease a large cookie sheet with margarine and set aside. In a large sized skillet, heat the oil and sauté the onions until limp. Add mushrooms, season with salt and pepper, and sauté for 10 minutes. Remove from skillet and set aside.

Now, place ground beef into skillet, season with salt and pepper and brown by thoroughly cooking the meat. Add the mushrooms to the browned meat and cook for about five minutes. Remove meat mixture from heat and add mashed potatoes and mix well. Season with garlic powder, onion powder, and if necessary, with salt and pepper to taste.

Cut prepared matzah into fourths. Place about one tablespoon of meat mixture in the centre of each quarter and fold cut side diagonally over to close and form a triangle. Place turnovers onto greased cookie sheet. Using a knife or pastry brush, lightly brush tops of turnovers with softened margarine.

Place turnovers into preheated oven and bake for approximately 30 minutes. Serve with olives and pickles. Yield: 4 dozen turnovers.

MATZAH FRUIT PANCAKES

- 2 cups matzah (full and compacted cups)
- 1 cup milk
- 4 eggs, beaten
- 2 cups fruit, diced (apples, pears, peaches)
- 2 tbsp. sugar
- ½ stick margarine
- 1½ cup sour cream
- ¼ cup Passover powdered sugar

In a large bowl, break matzah into pieces and combine with the milk until liquid has been absorbed. Add the eggs, fruit, sugar and mix well.

Over medium heat, place about two tablespoons of margarine in a medium sized non-stick skillet. It is real important that skillet is properly heated before starting to cook pancakes. Now, place about ⅓ cup of the fruit mixture in the hot skillet. Spread the mixture with the back of the spoon to somewhat flatten out to about three to four inches wide. This will allow room for about three pancakes in your skillet at a time. Cook for about three minutes on each side or until golden, then transfer onto a serving platter, garnish with sour cream and powdered sugar or regular sugar if Passover powdered sugar is not available. Yield: 12 to 15 pancakes.

COR holiday information

The Kosher Information Service of the Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, publishes a COR holiday information and recipe pamphlet for each major holiday.

Esther Schwartz, the council's kosher food consultant, prepares and tests the recipes. The recipes for Passover 1996-5756 include: puree of celery soup, toasted farfel, glazed Cornish hens with fruit stuffing, stuffed pepper cups, orange-avocado salad, apple or pear crunch and matzah cracker treats.

If you wish to be placed on the COR mailing list, call the Kashruth Council 416-635-9550 or write to 4600 Bathurst St. Suite 240, North York, Ont. M2R 3V2.

GLAZED CORNISH HENS WITH FRUIT STUFFING

4 Cornish hens
Salt, pepper, ginger

Stuffing:

1 cup farfel
1 cup dried fruit
¼ cup finely chopped onion
¼ cup Pesach liqueur
1 tbsp oil (for brushing hens)

Glaze:

3 tbsp. apricot jam
2 tbsp. liqueur or honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice
Mixed together

Preheat oven to 375 F. Sprinkle inside and outside of hens with salt, pepper and ginger. Combine stuffing ingredients, mixing well. Stuff hens and truss securely. Place breast side up on rack in shallow roasting pan. Brush lightly with oil. Roast, loosely covered with foil for 30 minutes. Uncover, roast one hour longer basting with glaze every 15 minutes. Drumstick will twist easily in socket when hens are done. Place on serving platter and surround with stuffed pepper cups (see recipe).

Serves 4 if small hens, 8 if large hens cut in halves.

STUFFED PEPPER CUPS — Pareve

4 medium sized peppers (your choice of color)

Cut off tops and set aside; remove seeds and membranes. Parboil cups in boiling salted water for about five minutes. Drain. (For crisp peppers, omit parboiling).

Stuffing:

3 tomatoes, blanched, peeled and chopped
1 onion, finely chopped
1 garlic clove, crushed
¼ lb. mushrooms, finely chopped
½ cup celery, finely chopped
4 tbsp. matzah meal
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Simmer vegetables for about 10 minutes or until liquid is absorbed. Fold in matzah meal, salt and pepper.

Preheat oven to 350 F.

Place peppers in a casserole. Spoon stuffing into peppers. Replace tops. Bake 20 minutes.

Note: For dairy meal, uncover tops, sprinkle with mozzarella cheese. Return to oven for 10 minutes to melt cheese. Serves 4.

APPLE OR PEAR CRUNCH — Pareve

Good for snack or dessert.

6 apples or pears peeled, cored and sliced
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
Juice and rind of ½ lemon
½ cup matzah meal
½ cup toasted farfel (see below) or chopped nuts
¼ cup Passover brown sugar
½ cup hard margarine
Preheat oven to 425 F.

Lightly grease an 8 x 8 inch pan. Toss apples or pears with one tbsp. brown sugar and cinnamon. Sprinkle with lemon juice and rind. Layer in bottom of pan. Mix together the matzah meal, toasted farfel or nuts and brown sugar. Cut in margarine until mixture is crumbly. Spread over fruit and bake for 30 minutes. Serve warm or chilled.

Serves 6 to 8.

TOASTED FARFEL— Pareve

Preheat oven to 350 F.
2 cups farfel
2 egg yolks, beaten
½ tsp. salt

Combine ingredients. Spread out on foil lined cookie sheet and bake until golden, about 20 to 25 minutes. Serve in your favorite soup salad or dessert. Yield: 2 cups.

TURKEY AND SWEET POTATO TZIMMES

2 lbs. boneless, skinless turkey breasts or thighs cut into 1-inch cubes
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 lb. baby carrots or 5 to 6 large carrots cut into 1-inch slices
2 cups water
2 large potatoes, peeled, cut into 1-inch chunks
2-3 large yams or sweet potatoes, peeled, cut into 1-inch chunks
⅓ cup honey
½ tsp. cinnamon
8 ozs. pitted prunes

In a heavy pot over medium heat, brown turkey in oil. Drain drippings. Add carrots and water and heat to a boil. Reduce heat to low. Cover and simmer for one hour. Add potatoes, honey and cinnamon and heat to a boil. Reduce heat to low.

Cover and simmer for 10 minutes. Add prunes. Simmer uncovered for 30 minutes more, until turkey is tender, stirring occasionally. Can be reheated in the oven before serving. Serves 8.

KISHKE

½ cup carrots, grated
½ cup finely chopped celery
1 onion, grated
3 cups matzah, finely crushed
¼ cup margarine, melted
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
2 eggs, lightly beaten

Combine all ingredients in a bowl and mix well to blend. Shape mixture into 1/16-inch very compact roll and place on a non-stick sprayed cookie sheet. Bake in a 350 degree oven for one hour. Cut while hot into ½- to 1-inch slices.

CHOCOLATE TORTE

1 large baked sponge cake, sliced
1 lb. semisweet chocolate
6 tbsp. sugar
6 tbsp. water
8 eggs, separated
Whipped topping

Melt chocolate in a double boiler over simmering water. Add sugar and water. Remove from heat and stir until sugar is dissolved. In a separate bowl, beat egg yolks.

Stir into chocolate mixture and blend well. Cool. With a clean mixer and bowl, whip egg whites until stiff. Fold into chocolate mixture. Line sides and bottom of a 9- to 10-inch springform pan with slices of sponge cake. Pour half of chocolate mixture into pan. Add a layer of remaining sponge cake slices and top with remaining chocolate mixture. Refrigerate overnight. Remove sides of springform, and frost torte with whipped topping. Yield: 10 to 12 servings.

APRICOT SQUARES

½ lb. margarine or butter
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. lemon juice
2 egg yolks
2 cups matzah meal

Filling:

1 lb. jar apricot preserves
¼ cup lemon juice
½ cup chopped nuts

Cream margarine and sugar. Add lemon juice, two egg yolks and matzah meal. Mix into a ball. Take one-quarter of the dough, wrap in plastic and freeze. Pat remaining dough into a 9-inch x 13-inch baking pan and pat dough up the sides about one inch. Bake in a 350 degree oven for 20 minutes.

Mix filling ingredients and while crust is hot, spread filling over dough.

Thinly grate frozen dough over filling to cover completely, working quickly. Return to oven for another 30 minutes or until golden brown. Place on rack to cool. Cut into squares.

Chicken dish

Empire Poultry sends along this delectable (and easy) Passover chicken dish, that's good all year round.

ORANGE CHICKEN

4 chicken breast cutlets
1 cup orange juice
¼ cup brown sugar, or regular sugar, if Passover brown sugar is not available grated orange rind
1 tablespoon potato starch

Cook all ingredients for the sauce over medium heat, stirring constantly until thick and glossy. Pour sauce over frozen chicken cutlets, bake uncovered approximately 30 minutes at 350 degrees. This sauce may also be used for microwaved cutlets. If using fresh chicken cutlets, adjust time accordingly. Serves 4.

STEELES DOES IT AGAIN

Following a tradition of the past several years, Steeles Memorial Chapel is once again generously supplying kosher food for Passover to Extendicare Bayview Nursing Home and to needy Russian families. The 75 to 100 Jewish residents of Extendicare Bayview will enjoy Pesach with matzah, dietetic egg kichel and jam, applesauce, gefilte fish, cheese slices, cottage cheese and juices. Russian families in need will be able to celebrate a proper Pesach with matzah, candles, gefilte fish, wine and grape juice, cheese and chickens.

Keep salads on your menu

Salads seem to disappear during Pesach, along with the chometz. But they don't have to.

Here are some quick, delicious salads from a delightful pamphlet Beyond Milk & Honey, published by the Israel Embassy in Washington.

AVOCADO SALAD

1 medium avocado
1 minced onion
lemon juice to taste
2 hard boiled eggs
salt, pepper, paprika to taste

Cut avocado in half, scoop out fruit. Add chopped eggs, onion, seasonings and lemon juice. Serve on lettuce.

CARROT SALAD

4 carrots
1 handful raisins
¼ cup fresh orange juice
½ tsp. sugar

Peel and grate carrots. Mix in a bowl with raisins and orange juice. Add sugar to taste.

GREEN PEPPER SALAD

4 large green peppers
½ cup Passover oil
2 tbs. lemon juice
2 garlic cloves, minced
salt and pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 400°. Place whole peppers on a flat baking tray and roast, turning often, until skin is soft. Remove from oven and peel. Remove seeds and cut peppers into strips. In a non-metal dish, mix oil, lemon juice and garlic. Stir in pepper strips, season with salt and pepper, and chill.

Quick holiday suggestions

It's six o'clock, everyone wants dinner, and you are still in the middle of Pesach cleaning.

Try these quick suggestions — or have the family pitch in!

ONION AND MUSHROOM OMELETTE
(Foodland Ontario)

2 eggs
1 tbsp water
Salt and pepper to taste
Pinch dried tarragon or chervil (optional)
1 tsp butter or vegetable oil
3 tbsp chopped onion
2 thinly sliced mushrooms

Lightly beat together eggs, water, salt, pepper and tarragon or chervil (if using) with a fork.

In 8-in. non-stick skillet, melt butter over medium-high heat. Stir in onion and mushrooms and cook until tender, about two mins. Spoon vegetables onto plate.

Add egg mixture to skillet; as mixture sets at edges, use spatula to gently push cooked portions to the centre, tilting and rotating pan to let uncooked egg flow underneath. Just before completely set, spread evenly in pan. Spoon filling over half the omelette; fold on filled side of omelette over filling; and lift onto serving plate. Serves 1.

BAKED POTATOES WITH MUSHROOM FILLING
(Foodland Ontario)

Make an easy meatless main dish with these cheesy stuffed potatoes. Once they're popped into the oven, toss a salad and set the table — dinner's ready!

4 large potatoes
¼ cup yogurt
1 tbsp melted butter
1 tbsp grated Parmesan cheese, kosher
1 tsp dried chervil
½ tsp salt
1/8 tsp pepper
1 tbsp butter
¾ cup sliced mushrooms
1 small onion, chopped

Wash and dry potatoes. Prick skin with a fork. For a soft skin, rub with butter. Bake at 425°F 45 to 50 mins. or 350°F 55 to 65 mins. Cut a slice from the top of each potato. Scoop out potato pulp and place in large bowl. Beat potato pulp with yogurt, butter, Parmesan cheese, chervil, salt and pepper, until smooth. In small skillet, saute mushrooms and onion in remaining butter for five mins. Gently stir into potato mixture. Spoon filling into potato shells. Return filled potatoes to oven and bake at 375°F 25 mins. Makes 4 servings.

Imaginative recipes

California Kosher, a collection of contemporary and traditional kosher recipes, offers many imaginative recipes for the Passover season.

Compiled and designed by 125 members of the Women's League of Adat Ari El, one of the largest conservative congregations in Southern California, California Kosher is a cookbook used by culinary artists from Los Angeles to New York, Seattle to Miami, Vancouver to Australia and even Israel.

FROZEN STRAWBERRY MERINGUE TORTE (pareve)

Crust:
5 oz. almond macaroons (1½ cups)
2 tsp. melted margarine
½ cup chopped pecans
Filling:
2 egg whites (room temperature)
1 cup sugar
2 cups sliced fresh strawberries
1 tbsp. lemon juice
Sauce:
1 10 oz. package frozen strawberries
3 tbsp. frozen undiluted orange juice concentrate
1 tbsp. currant jelly
1 cup sliced fresh strawberries

To make crust process macaroons, margarine and nuts until mixture holds together. Press into a 10-inch springform pan. Bake in a preheated 350 degree oven seven to 10 minutes. Let cool.

In a bowl, beat on low speed the egg whites, sugar, strawberries and lemon juice until blended. Increase speed to high and beat until stiff peaks from (10 to 15 minutes). Pour into cooled crust and freeze until firm (six hours). Remove from freezer. Serve directly from freezer.

Sauce ingredients should be pureed together. Pour over each slice.

Passover Foods

Traditional Tunisian ingredients, many of which have been colored by spices and herbs such as saffron, tumeric and paprika.

Tunisia serves up some hot stuff

World Zionist Press Service

Tunisian cuisine is not as exotic as one might imagine, although it is very hot. In fact, Tunisian Jews probably have as many recipies for making hot sauce as Russian and Polish Jews have for borscht.

Hot sauces in themselves, however, do not create a national culinary style, and the Tunisian kitchen, although based on a country-style cuisine, is a rich one. Popular dishes include tagines, meat or poultry stews ofen cooked together with fruits; fish dishes that rely on subtle seasoning and vegetables; poultry or fish; merguez, a sausage; and marvellous sweet pastries and cream desserts.

The following recipes are designed to serve six to eight.

STUFFED FENNEL BULBS

6 fennel bulbs, well washed
1¼ lb. minced beef
3 tbsp. parsley, chopped fine
1½ tsp. tabil (recipe follows)
1 tsp. pepper
salt to taste
6 tbsp. olive oil
3 eggs, lightly beaten
2 tbsp. matzah meal
375 grams spicy tomato sauce

Tabil

Combine 2½ tsp. each finely chopped garlic, ground caraway seeds, crushed hot red pepper flakes and ground coriander seeds. The mixture may be as hot or mild as one likes by varying the amount of hot pepper flakes. Keeps almost indefinitely in a well sealed jar.

Cut off the hard bases of the fennel bulbs and cook in lightly salted water just until tender, about 15 min. Drain and cut in half lengthwise.

In a mixing bowl, combine meat, parsley, tabil, pepper and salt. Blend thoroughly. In a skillet heat the oil and fry the mixture until well browned. Let cool, and mix in the eggs and matzah meal.

Place 6 of the fennel halves cut side up on a greased baking dish and onto these, pile the filling. Top with the remaining fennel halves, spoon over the tomato sauce and bake in a hot oven for 20 min. Serve hot.

TAGINE WITH CHICKEN AND FRUITS

1 large or 2 small chickens, cut into serving pieces
2 onions, finely chopped
¼ cup parsley
2-3 tbsp. pareve margarine
¼ tsp. ground ginger
salt and pepper to taste
1 lb. pears, apples, prunes, or a mixture, cored, peeled and sliced

Place the chicken, onions and parsley in a large pot. Pour over the water to cover. Add the margarine and ginger and season with salt and pepper. Bring to the boil and then simmer gently, covered, until the chicken is very tender, about 1 hr. Add fruit and continue to simmer until they are just tender, taking care not to let the fruits disintegrate.

HONEY CREAM

6 oz. superfine sugar
1¼ cups kosher sweet white wine
5 tbsp. honey
1 tsp. grated lemon rind pinch cinnamon
4 whole eggs
2 egg yolks

In a heavy skillet, slowly heat the sugar in 2 tsp. water, stirring regularly, until sugar has melted and turned into a caramel syrup. Immediately pour the syrup into a cake tin, tilting it so that the entire bottom of the tin is coated. Let cool.

In a saucepan, heat the wine and honey, stirring until the honey dissolves. Add cinnamon and lemon rind, stirring well. Remove from flame and let cool.

In a mixing bowl, beat together egg yolks and eggs. Add to the honey-wine mixture, beating until well blended, and pour into the cake tin. Place the tin in a large pot of water. Be sure the water is not higher than ½ in. from the lip of the tin. Bake in a medium oven until the mixture is set, about 45 min. Let cool for 15-20 min., and refrigerate.

Just before serving, run a thin knife blade around the edges to loosen the sides and invert onto a chilled serving dish.

Passover Foods

Empire serves up some new lighter selections

Empire Kosher has developed a selection of new recipes just for Passover, to complement traditional, special dishes with a new, lighter twist and some exciting flavor combinations.

GRILLED CHICKEN WITH ROSEMARY AND TOMATO SAUCE
(Serves 6)

6 chicken breast cutlets, flattened to ¼ inch
4 cloves garlic, minced
2 tbsp. fresh rosemary leaves, chopped
3 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
½ cup orange juice
1 tbsp. oil
Freshly ground pepper
Pinch ginger
3 medium zucchini, cut in thirds lengthwise
2 fresh peppers, green, yellow or red, cut into 1 inch strips
24 medium sized mushrooms

Mix garlic, herbs and spices, juices and oil in a large bowl. Pour ⅔ of the marinade over the chicken, turn and coat well. Place cut vegetables on a foil lined pan. Brush with the remaining marinade. Marinate for about 2 hours in the refrigerator.

Preheat grill or broiler, broil chicken and vegetables about 2 to 4 minutes on each side, or until done. Serve with tomato sauce on the side:

Tomato Sauce

2 cups onions, chopped
2 tbsp. Passover olive oil
1 32-oz. can plum tomatoes, drained and finely chopped
¼ cup fresh parsley
Pinch of cinnamon, pinch of ginger

Saute onions in oil for about 10 minutes or until they begin to brown. Add tomatoes, parsley and spices, heat briefly and serve with cutlets.

CHICKEN VEGETABLE SOUP WITH EXOTIC MUSHROOMS
(Serves 4)

1 medium potato, diced
1 tbsp. margarine or oil
2 onions, thinly sliced
¼ lb. porcini or shiitake mushrooms, cut into strips
1 medium parsnip, diced
¼ lb. boneless, skinless chicken breast cutlet, cut into ¼ inch chunks
2 bay leaves
2 sprigs fresh thyme
Freshly ground black pepper
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
4 cups chicken stock
½ cup fresh parsley, coarsely chopped
2 tbsp. fresh thyme, chopped
1 tsp. fresh lemon juice

Boil the potato in water until tender, about 10 minutes. Drain, set aside.

Chicken vegetable soup

Melt margarine or add oil to the bottom of a large soup pot. Add the vegetables, cover and cook over medium low heat about 7 minutes. Do not brown vegetables, just let them "sweat." Add chicken, bay leaves, thyme, pepper and lemon rind and cook for 2 minutes. Add the chicken stock, bring to a boil. As soon as the liquid comes to a boil, remove the chicken with a slotted spoon. Set chicken aside.

Lower the heat and gently simmer the stock for 15 minutes. Remove bay leaves and return chicken and potatoes to the pot. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Add parsley, thyme and lemon juice. Serve at once.

EMPIRE'S PASSOVER BURGERS
(Serves 4)

½ cup seltzer water
½ cup matzo meal
1 cup finely chopped celery
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1 tbsp. oil
1 lb. ground turkey or chicken
1 large egg white, beaten to a light froth
Freshly ground pepper

Soak the matzo meal in seltzer water for 20 minutes. Saute the celery and onion over medium heat in 1 tablespoon oil for about 5 minutes or until wilted. Remove and let cool. In a large bowl, mix all ingredients thoroughly. Form into patties and refrigerate for about 20 minutes. Saute the burgers over medium high heat, about 10 to 12 minutes or until no longer pink.

CHICKEN CASSEROLE WITH RED WINE SAUCE
(Serves 4)

Use your favorite cuts of chicken: A whole bird cut into 8 pieces, 4 breasts or 4 leg quarters. Remove skin and excess fat.

1 tbsp. Passover olive oil
2 shallots, chopped
5 leeks, washed well, cut into 1 inch pieces
2 small or 1 large carrot, peeled, sliced thinly
2 stalks celery, sliced
2 garlic cloves, chopped
½ lb. small white mushrooms, left whole
2 cups dry red wine, Kosher for Passover
1 cup chicken stock
2 bay leaves
Fresh thyme
1 tsp. potato starch

Heat the oil and brown the chicken, about 5 minutes per side. Remove with a slotted spoon and set aside. Add the vegetables to the pot and saute briefly, about 2 minutes. Add stock, wine and herbs and bring to a boil. Return chicken pieces to the pot, reduce heat and simmer uncovered about 20 to 30 minutes, or until chicken is tender. If the liquid seems thin at this point, mix the potato starch with a little cold water and whisk into the stock. Remove bay leaves, sprinkle with thyme and serve with small potatoes.

The new LCBO full-service store at 5995 Yonge St. offers, among many services, a kosher products section. LCBO product consultant Gizella Fekete (right) discusses kosher wines with another member of the staff. The store, which opened on Feb. 12, is one of 32 LCBO outlets in Ontario offering an extensive selection of kosher for Passover products this year.

LCBO offers over 25 special Pesach products

The Liquor Control Board of Ontario (LCBO) is offering more than 25 special products, in addition to its regularly available kosher listings, in time for Passover.

Included in the selection now available at selected LCBO stores are red, white and rose table wines from Israel, France, California and New York State. There are also liqueurs, grape brandy, and flavored and dessert wines. Prices for these products range from $5.95 to $20.95 for wines, and up to $22.50 for spirits.

"These special kosher for Passover purchases are part of a larger LCBO program designed to meet the preferences and interests of our customers in specific communities and ethnic groups," says Anne Hartley, director, Product Management. "To serve these special markets, and offer the public the widest possible product selection at competitive prices, the LCBO buys thousands of products from suppliers in more than 40 different countries."

Consumers can also order kosher products, based on availability, from any LCBO store across Ontario. LCBO unit sales for kosher products sold during Passover 1995 rose by 6.3 percent over the previous year.

Kosher for Passover products are now available in selected stores in Metropolitan Toronto, Hamilton, Kingston, Kitchener-Waterloo, London, Richmond Hill, Thornhill, Ottawa, Peterborough, St. Catherines and Windsor.

I'm proud to be a Carleton Jew

By MIRIAM VALE
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — I'm the Carleton Jew.

One of my friends from Toronto gave me that nickname last year after he visited me in Ottawa. Of course, it's not entirely true, (there are a few others around at Carleton University), but you can be sure you won't confuse my alma mater with YorkWesternMcGill.

So when I was approached to write about my Jewish identity at university, I was slightly confused. I mean, was I to give the lowdown on the practically non-existent Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at Carleton or about the only course (a half credit) the school offers on Judaism. Or should I talk about me?

Summers at Canadian Young Judaea camps

Let me put this article into context: I went to Associated Hebrew Day Schools, I graduated from Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and spent my summers at Canadian Young Judaea camps. My interactions with non-Jews was limited to infrequent swimming and driving lessons, sports teams and my father's annual office parties.

Yes, I was sheltered. But I didn't know any different and I don't think I wanted to know any different.

But I wanted to be a journalist and study away from home. Carleton was the only logical choice for me. Of course, I heard all about its esteemed journalism program and the plethora of successful Carleton journalism graduates who now are talking heads on the CBC, but all I could think about was that I wouldn't know anyone.

To make a long story extremely short, I went to Carleton, I'm having an amazing time. It's my second year in j-school. I'm flooded with school work and I live with four friends whom I adore.

So aren't you going to ask the question? (To be asked in a whisper in private:) Are they Jewish?

No. And I would be lying if I said it doesn't matter even one iota. I love them and they are great friends, but sometimes I wish my home in Ottawa was kosher like my home in Thornhill. Often, I wish there were Friday night dinners without Mr. Noodles or pork pot pie as entrees.

Living is the art of compromise and I can deal with putting a Jewish home on temporary hold for four years — six, if a Master's degree comes into the picture.

The social scene at Carleton is much the same.

Sometimes it's fun convincing yourself that the guy in your history class may be a platinum blond Jew or that the professor who has made numerous references to her favorite novel — The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz — is obviously Jewish. But you know the truth.

I enjoy listening to people from the Big Three (YorkWesternMcGill tell me about their plans to do a combined major in Jewish studies or about their jaunt to Hebrew U. for their third year abroad.

And I'm jealous. Not about third year abroad or weekly JSU dances where there are tons of eligible guys, but about where I'm going after my four years in Ottawa are finished.

Most of my friends' paths will lead them back to Toronto into our Jewish circle of friends. Few of them will ever find themselves in situations where Jews are in the minority. I'm envious because the direction of their lives is clear. I have lived in both worlds now and I'm torn between them.

I'll always be Jewish. But I wonder if ever again I will find myself in a situation with a surplus of Jews. And more importantly, do I want to see myself there again?

I don't know.

But my insecurity will never threaten my Jewish identity. Thanks to Carleton, I know where I came from and who I am. I am one of a few. People ask me about being Jewish and not having Christmas and I answer their questions. Before I left home, no one asked me these questions because we all were the answers.

I tell the curious ones I am a Jew. There isn't Christmas or Easter; there is no bread on Passover and there are candles on Friday night. I tell them I love Israel unconditionally and want peace there soon. I tell them I'm not an observant Jew, but I respect the Orthodox Jews who follow the laws of the Torah as well as those who don't.

It's true I knew and felt all of these things before I left home. But I never had the chance to explain my Jewish identity. And why would I? Two years ago, almost every nook and cranny of my life was Jewish. My friends from Toronto would never ask me these questions; they were the answers.

So change my background and drop me in Saskatchewan, Algeria or New Zealand, but I'll still be Jewish.

It may sound like an extended version of Dr. Seuss's Green Eggs and Ham, but it's all true.

Call me the Carleton Jew — I'll be sure to respond.

Credit or cash?

Said one innkeeper to the other:
"I rarely sell a man whisky on credit, but when I do, I charge him double."
"I, on the other hand," said the second innkeeper, "charge less on credit than for cash."
"What's the logic in that?"
"Very simple. If the man doesn't pay on credit it makes my loss that much less." (from A Treasury of Jewish Humour, ed. by Nathan Ausubel)

Hamas' victims mourned

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — About 500 members of Winnipeg's Jewish community gathered recently at the Rosh Pina Synagogue to remember those who were killed by Hamas suicide bombers over the previous two weeks.

The first speaker, educator Maxine Zimmerman, had just returned from her first visit to Israel. She told of a young Ethiopian woman, a regular rider on the ill-fated Bus 18, who missed the bus on the first Sunday. She was on television constantly throughout the week proclaiming the miracle that saved her life. The next Sunday, she caught her bus and was among the dead.

Zimmerman also spoke of friends in Israel whose son's best friend was among the victims. The friend had been visiting just moments before boarding the bus.

"Our friends were angry that we didn't phone right after the bombing," Zimmerman recalled. "They said they needed our strength."

Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate student Sarah Mintz recalled her first visit to Israel two years ago when she went on the March of the Living. She described her week in Israel as the best week of her life.

"Israel is a second home to us," she said. "We can't let terrorists keep us away or let the victims of these horrible bombings be forgotten.

Yael Meyerowitz, the 12-year-old daughter of Rabbi Allan Meyerowitz of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, read a poem dedicated to the memory of her teacher at a camp in New York last summer. He was among the victims.

The most powerful speech was given by Rosh Pina's Rabbi Akiba Lubow, who spoke movingly of many of the dead on an individual basis. He told the story of two 18-year-olds in Tel Aviv, one just a week away from his bar mitzvah, who were killed on their way to a Purim party. He spoke of the six Russian olim who died, the yeshivah students from the United States, young women engaged to be married and the 8-year-old who lost both his parents.

"We must mourn victims of senseless terrorist attacks and express solidarity with the people of Israel," Rabbi Lubow said. "We must do everything in our power to make sure no Israeli child must fear getting on a bus."

The final speaker of the afternoon was Chaim Waxman, consul general of Israel, who was in Winnipeg to speak at a different time and location, but spoke instead at the memorial service. He spoke briefly of the need for the Palestinian Authority to do more to root out terrorism in order for the peace process to continue.

CLARIFICATION

An item run recently in The CJN about the Jewish National Fund (JNF) participation in building a park and amphitheatre in Jerusalem as a gift for Jerusalem 3000 may have given the impression that Naomi Frankenburg of Vancouver was chair of the campaign to raise all the necessary funds for the international project. Actually, Frankenberg is the JNF national chair for the Canadian campaign.

UN to coordinate Palestinian emergency fund

By DAVID MAKOVSKY and BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - The UN plans to coordinate an emergency three-month $100 million (US) public works fund for Palestinians living in the territories, due to Israeli signals that the territories' closure will continue until after the May 29 elections, officials indicated last Sunday.

Furthermore, Israel's planned pull-back from Hebron on March 28 will be delayed indefinitely until the Palestinian Authority (PA) catches top Hamas fugitives, including Mohammed Dief, Israel's Prime Minister Shimon Peres told the cabinet.

Apart from continuing the closure, Peres also said that he favors deporting Palestinians linked to suicide bombers and will continue blowing up the houses of families of suicide bombers.

Terje Larsen, UN special coordinator for the territories, confirmed that the Palestinians and Israelis have approved putting together an emergency fund of $100 million for public works inside the territories.

"We need to put together an emergency fund of donors now because the situation is at best fragile, and if left unchecked, it will become unpredictably dangerous and unstable in the next few weeks," he declared.

Larsen said that $40 million of the funds would go to Gaza and $60 million to the West Bank. He estimated that 20,000 workers from Gaza depend upon Israel for their livelihood, and each worker feeds about 10 people. He also estimated that 50,000 Palestinian workers from the West Bank also depend upon work in Israel.

He said that the $100 million will include an injection of fresh money as well as the rechanneling of existing funds, fueling speculation that this will include earmarked project assistance.

Meetings were to be held on the issue this week, including a key session in Gaza bringing together Palestinians and representatives of the World Bank and key donor countries the United States, European Union, Japan, Norway and Israel.

Peres informed the cabinet of the fund's formation at last Sunday's cabinet meeting. He said Israel will contribute to the fund, but did not specify how much.

Regarding the ban on Palestinian employment inside Israel until after the elections, it should be noted that top Labor officials fear that more suicide bombings before the balloting could cause them to slide in the polls, as they did in the wake of four suicide attacks in recent weeks.

Regarding a delay in the pull-back from Hebron, Peres declared, "So long as an ill wind emanates from Gaza, and Mohammed Dief plans attacks which could come from Hebron as well, we have a problem. Until Dief and his friends are caught, we will not leave Hebron."

Israel gave the PA a list of 13 wanted Hamas fugitives, but only some have been caught.

Peres insisted that the PA could have apprehended Dief recently in Gaza but did not do so. The New York Times reported that during the recent wave of suicide bombings, Dief was seen sipping coffee with Col. Mohammed Dahlan, head of the PA Preventive Security apparatus in Gaza and in charge of the crackdown there on Hamas. This could not be confirmed.

Peres' remark about Hebron was the second condition he imposed for the IDF to pull back from there. He said that a Hebron pull-back was contingent upon the PNC amending its 1964 charter, which calls for Israel's destruction. Palestinian officials said that the charter would be amended before the end of next month.

Moreover, despite objections by Meretz ministers and Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair, Peres went on record Sunday as saying that he favored deportations for Palestinians tied to suicide bombers.

Islamic terrorist arrested

By BILL HUTMAN and JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - The Palestinian Police has arrested an Islamic Jihad terrorist who planned a suicide bomb attack last week at the Tel Aviv central bus station. The police said he was caught with 12 kilos of explosives.

The arrest and the identification of the Dizengoff Centre bomber as a known Islamic Jihad activist have prompted police to concentrate on arresting other Islamic Jihad activists over the past few days.

Gaza police chief Ghazi Jabali reissued orders last Sunday that Palestinian residents must report any information they may have on the whereabouts of illegal arms and wanted men, or face prosecution.

Meanwhile, according to a senior Israeli security source, the threat of a Hamas terror attack remains serious, despite the crackdown by security forces on the group since the Dizengoff suicide bombing.

"Hamas still has the capability and the will to carry out another suicide attack," the source said.

The source said there was concern within the security establishment over how long the high alert now in effect can be kept up. For instance, police officers in Jerusalem and other parts of the country are working 12-hour shifts daily and their vacations have been canceled.

Weak anti-terror bill passes

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – The counter-terrorism legislation long hoped for by many Jewish groups has all but died in Congress.

The House of Representatives last Thursday passed a weak bill with none of the elements touted as effective to combat terrorists and their support networks on American soil.

Jewish organizations, which had made the measure a centerpiece of their legislative agenda during the past year, were reeling from the passage of a bill they widely described as "eviscerated."

Jewish officials here lambasted Congress for "abdicating" their responsibility as elected officials.

"You don't even have the illusion of effective anti-terrorism legislation," said Jess Hordes, director of the Anti-Defamation League's Washington office.

Lawmakers and their supporters in the Jewish community once hailed the measure as a means to stop Hamas and other terrorist groups from fundraising in the United States. The bill was also supposed to allow for expedited deportations of aliens suspected of terrorism.

Instead, the House passed a measure with few anti-terrorism provisions. Even the name of the bill was changed to reflect the priorities of the lawmakers. It was changed from the Omnibus Counterterrorism Act to the Effective Death Penalty and Personal Security Act.

Attention has now shifted to House and Senate negotiators who will seek to hammer out differences in each chamber's version.

But with a gutted House bill and a Senate bill widely described as "ineffective," activists hold little hope of winning approval for a law that would designate groups as terrorists and ban material support, including funds, to them.

In a statement issued from Jerusalem, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations said, "It is a terrible irony that while the president convened 30 heads of state to secure their commitment to fight terrorism on a global scale, the Congress of the United States has failed to provide U.S. law enforcement agencies with the necessary mandate and means to prosecute the battle in our own country."

U. S. joins fight against terrorism

CIA director John Deutch was still working on the final details of a counterterrorism accord, which could result in increased cooperation between U.S. and Israeli intelligence operations in pursuing terrorists, officials said privately.

The administration is also working with Israel on a defence agreement, which would provide for closer military ties between the nations. The United States hopes to conclude the pact before Peres comes to Washington in April.

At the news conference, Clinton said he doubted that the anti-terrorism summit would reach the hearts of those who "strap explosives to their bodies and blow themselves up, killing themselves and innocent victims;" nor would it persuade them to do otherwise.

But he said the participants at the summit could work together to minimize the risk of terror by preventing money and materials from reaching the terrorists.

Both Clinton and Peres said they were disappointed by Syria's refusal to attend the summit, but said it should not undermine the peace talks.

Peres said that even though Syria must be pressed upon to not to support or shelter terror or terrorists, "we don't want to close all doors."

The president also met with Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert and Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

After his meeting with Netanyahu, Clinton made an unscheduled stop at Beit Hinuch high school, which lost four former students in the two Jerusalem suicide bombings.

Work on Auschwitz mall on track despite objections

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Construction of a huge shopping mall across the street from Auschwitz is going ahead, despite a plea from the president of Poland that it be stopped.

A Polish journalist just back from the scene told The CJN that the new building, to house a supermarket, home and garden centre, and fast food restaurants, is already five feet above ground and the opening date has been advanced to May 30.

Ewa Grochowska also said the construction superintendent told her the Polish and German developers are ready to invest $15 million (US) in the plaza, and if there is a judicial order to stop, they will ask for punitive damages.

Polish President Aleksander Kwasniewski, through his press aide, said Auschwitz was an inappropriate place for the shopping plaza.

A six-person commission appointed by Culture Minister Zdzislaw Podkanski arrived at the site March 14 empowered to report back on legal and environmental aspects within a week.

Meanwhile, charges are swirling around the project that the Polish developer, Janus Marszalek, is the co-owner of the former Carmelite convent at Auschwitz, which now houses the Society of the Victims of War, of which he is the leader.

Questions are being raised about why Auschwitz Museum director Jerzy Wroblewski agreed to the mall, and why the culture minister took no action even though he was informed two years ago.

"How can that desecrate the memory of this place?" Marszalek said in an interview with Polish news agencies. He said the 25,000-square-metre mall, 30 metres from the camp's visitors' centre, would create jobs in Oswiecim, the town of 45,000 where Auschwitz is located. The camp is where 1.6 million Jews died.

Wroblewski said the mall was "in no way harmful," and accused the media of misrepresenting it. He said the project would "bring order" to the zone around the former death camp.

"This is clearly a brazen attempt to commercialize and capitalize on the 500,000 persons who visit Auschwitz annually," said Sigmund Sobolewski of Calgary, a Polish Catholic Auschwitz survivor, one of the first to protest the mall after learning of it in Polish newspapers. He said protests would take place concurrently in front of Polish consulates in Vancouver, New York and Chicago.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, sent an urgent protest to Polish Ambassador to Canada Tadeusz Diem.

Rabbi Avi Weiss, national president of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns-AMCHA, said he places blame on the Polish church and the Polish government, both of which, he said, have "no moral backbone."

Rabbi Weiss said he would go to great lengths to stop the construction of the mall, "even it if means sitting in front of the bulldozers.

"We view it as a positive first step that the Polish Minister of Culture, who supervises the Auschwitz Museum, has asked for a halt to construction of the shopping mall," he said.

AMCHA said two international agreements forbid any construction at Auschwitz. One is the 1972 UN Convention on the Protection of the World Cultural and National Heritage. The other is a 1979 UNESCO agreement that declared Auschwitz a "historical site and a place of human testimony," creating a 500-metre buffer zone around the camp's grounds.

AMCHA claims in a press release that the current mayor of Oswiecim, who granted the building permit, is also a former official of the ultra-nationalistic Society of Victims of War. It was this society which took over the Carmelite convent when Pope John Paul II ordered the nuns to leave in 1993.

In a late development, AMCHA announced it has contacted the International Association of Jewish Lawyers in Washington to investigate whether the Polish government has broken its agreement with UNESCO.

RIGHT-WING TRIO

Immigrants party launched

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Yisrael b'Aliyah, the new immigrants party, last Sunday held its founding convention in Jerusalem, electing its president, central committee and party list for the Knesset.

Close to 2,000 members of the movement-turned-party crammed into the International Convention Centre after each one had received at least 10 recommendations from movement members to be a delegate.

Almost all of the delegates hold academic degrees.

"A strong aliyah and a strong society go side by side in building the Zionist enterprise. They should nurture and strengthen each other and for this we have created this party," party founder Natan Sharansky declared.

Sharansky leads the list, Yuli Edelshtein, an educator from Alon Shvut and former adviser to Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, follows and Michael Nudelman, a lecturer in ecology at Tel Hai College and member of the Kiryat Shmona municipal council, is third.

There are 35,000 members of the movement. The polls predict that the party, which recently absorbed another Russian immigrant list, Aliyah, could receive at least four mandates.

"Israel is not good at absorbing immigrants properly and they have been forced to absorb them from the word go," Israel's Prime Minister Shimon Peres told the gathering. "I have not come to bring you honey and candies but to tell you the truth, to call on you to be full partners in building a state based on peace and security so that we can ensure our children's future."

Peres said he had a four-part plan: to bring more immigrants to Israel from all parts of the globe; to bring peace and security to the entire population; to establish peace with Israel's neighbors by the year 2000; and to build a country "where our values are as profound as our history and our economy as modern as the 21st century."

Earlier Netanyahu had thanked the olim for coming, saying he felt proud to be among "heroes and prophets such as many in this audience are."

A Likud-led government, he said, would not only make security the first requirement of peace. It would aim at bringing two million immigrants in the next decade, 200,000 per year. That is the only way to change from a country which has to beg for donations "to a flourishing economic power," he said. " It will create conditions for more aliyah."

Yisrael b'Aliyah activists insist that the party is not only for Russian speakers, although the convention was run in Russian.

NRP chooses candidates

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Nearly all National Religious Party (NRP) central committee members voted for the party's list of candidates for the Knesset last weekend in Tel Aviv.

The final results were expected to be announced early last Monday. NRP leader Zevulun Hammer, elected in an earlier procedure, stressed that he was hoping for a balanced list to include both political moderates and right-of-centre, and to preserve the even mix between Ashkenazi and Sephardi. Two women are also on the list of potential candidates, Dina Hahn and Viva Sivan, were both convinced they could win realistic slots without the help of reserved spots for women.

Hamas is weakened by bombing campaign

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The campaign of brutal terror launched by Hamas and Islamic Jihad against Israel in recent weeks, unprecedented in its ferocity, could be a turning point in the battle against Islamic fundamentalist terrorism.

The four suicide bombings, which snuffed out the lives of 58 people over a traumatic nine-day period, demoralized Israelis and shook the foundations of the Oslo peace process.

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

By the same token, the indiscriminate bombings have weakened and isolated Hamas and Islamic Jihad by virtue of having brought Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) closer together in a common strategic purpose to wipe out the terrorists' infrastructure.

Israel and the PA do not agree on each and every aspect of the war they have declared on these rejectionist groups. Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian self-rule areas, has voiced opposition to Israel's closure of the territories and its naval blockade of the Gaza Strip, measures Israel has taken before to contain terrorism.

Despite these sharp tactical disagreements, Israel and the PA have closed ranks in the interests of demolishing Hamas and Islamic Jihad, both of which oppose a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict, as well as Israel's very existence.

Prodded by Israel and the United States, the co-sponsor of last week's anti-terrorism conference in the Sinai Peninsula attended by 29 nations, the PA has moved resolutely.

The results have been fairly impressive so far. Hundreds of Hamas activists have been detained, while the deputy commander of Hamas' military wing, three of his cohorts and the recruiter of two of the suicide bombers have been arrested.

In addition, the PA has seized control of all mosques, hotbeds of anti-Israel rhetoric, and appointed more compliant clerics. Schools, clinics and charitable organizations linked with Hamas have been raided. Arafat has promised to ban all armed formations in Palestinian territories.

In light of Israel's recent warnings that the PA was not doing enough to eradicate terrorism, the Israeli government must be pleased with Arafat's new-found militancy.

As for the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, a clear majority support the clampdown, though not the blockade, realizing that terrorism has a direct bearing on their livelihood and reduces the chances of Palestinian self-determination.

By coming down so hard on Islamic radicals, the PA has tacitly acknowledged that its policy of co-opting Hamas in a fruitful political dialogue has failed.

Last year, Hamas agreed to cease hostilities in Palestinian self-rule areas, but the understanding broke down, particularly after the assassination of Yehiya (The Engineer) Ayyash by Israeli agents in early January. Furthermore, much to the PA's disappointment, Hamas boycotted the subsequent Palestinian elections, which, nevertheless, strengthened Arafat's overall position.

Although Hamas has threatened to continue its crusade of terror, and may yet succeed in carrying off more bombings in Israel, Hamas is a much-diminished and badly divided group following the latest crackdown.

Judging by the truces it has unilaterally offered and promptly violated since February, Hamas is evidently riven by serious splits between so-called moderates and radicals and between "insiders" in the territories and "outsiders" abroad.

Contrary to Hamas' calculations, the spate of bombings has neither destroyed the peace process, which is stronger than its detractors imagine, nor undermined the Labor party's prospects of defeating the Likud in the May 29 general election.

Israel's bilateral talks with the PA and with Syria, suspended by the bombings, are expected to resume. Israel's partial withdrawal from Hebron, scheduled to take place this month, has been put on hold pending the PLO's repeal of its noxious national covenant.

In the immediate wake of the bombings, Prime Minister Shimon Peres lost ground to Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu. But polls released last week showed that Peres has more or less bounced back, doubtless helped by the ongoing drive against Hamas, the offer by the United States to share intelligence data with Israel, and the Summit of the Peacemakers in Sharm El Sheikh, an exercise designed to shore up the peace process and express solidarity with Israel.

The bombings, however, have forced Peres to embrace a policy of "separation," something his late precedessor, Yitzhak Rabin, favored but he did not until the recent violence. Last week, Israel announced that 16,000 additional foreign workers will be allowed into the country, replacing Palestinians.

Only in this respect has Hamas had a real effect on Israel's agenda.

Media coverage of attacks must delight Hamas

By SHLOMO AVINERI
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Terrorists do not aim only to kill and maim. They also aim to terrorize. Their intended target is not only those they kill and wound, but also society's resilience. This puts the media in a democratic society in a bind.

Commentary

On the one hand, they have to report accurately, openly, immediately and reliably, without censorship. The enormity of the havoc caused by an attack should not be diminished, nor the suffering, pain, and anger denied.

But how can they describe the agony of the wounded and the anguish of family members without unwittingly becoming an accomplice of the terrorists?

It is a delicate line to tread and Israel's media, especially TV, have tripped up repeatedly over the past two horrible weeks. In their eagerness to cover it all in real time, they have played into the hands of the terrorists.

Examples abound. When a major newspaper leads its coverage with a blood-red banner headline proclaiming "A country in fear," it isn't informing, it is creating a mood. When it turns its entire news section over to gory pictures, most already seen on TV the previous day, it is not telling us anything we don't already know.

TV's dilemma is even more acute. Like radio, when terror strikes it automatically switches to live, virtually 24-hour coverage, turning a single act of horrendous terrorism into an ongoing drama.

TV is also unable to live up to its professional promise. The aftermath of an attack is like a battle situation. With reliable information in short supply, every bit of hearsay is broadcast as fact. As the news editor of TV's Channel 1 said on a talk show last Saturday: "What can we do? When you broadcast live, you lose control of what you're showing." Nothing could better encapsulate TV's dilemma.

One answer may be to abandon non-stop live coverage and revert to a more controlled mode, which would still give immediate news, but avoid spreading what amounts to panic and false information.

Hospital scenes do not convey hard news either, though stricken relatives make good "human" stories. And doctors, who should be operating or resting, are asked repeatedly for "real-time" reports on attack victims, when hourly bulletins would be more helpful.

By showing the anguished face of an injured person or a shocked relative again and again because there is no other footage to show, TV multiplies reality, which is already shocking enough.

How Hamas must delight in it.

Crowd response is equally distorting. The TV cameras will obviously pick up on any cursing or haranguing bystander. Cooler heads, who are the majority, will not be seen or heard. They lack the necessary "color."

Continuous radio and TV coverage also distorts the perception of government reaction. Reporting that "the cabinet is still in session" every five minutes isn't a news item; it only creates expectation. And when the meeting ends, only junior ministers have the time to answer questions and their answers will likely be irrelevant.

No responsible ministers would detail what the government has really decided. If they did, it would be treason.

As for the question of public morale, when TV interviewers ask people under the impact of an attack, "Will you ride a bus again?" it is clear what answer they are eliciting. This is precisely the question that shouldn't be asked.

The restraint and judgment required of the media should be even more of a guideline for public TV. TV news isn't entertainment or a vehicle for voyeurism. In a war situation, it is also a weapon.

When Winston Churchill was promising the British people "blood, sweat and tears," imagine the impact if TV (which didn't exist then) had gone around asking people, "How do you feel during night air-raids?" or "Do you fear a German invasion?" or "Do your children sleep at night?" Most assuredly it would not have been Britain's finest hour.

The media claim only to mirror reality. But while some mirrors reflect what is "out there," others patently distort. Still others magnify or multiply what they reflect. Our media should consider which kind of mirror they purport to be.

Shlomo Avineri is professor of political science at the Hebrew University and was director-general of the Foreign Ministry.

Amir verdict awaited

By RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Defence lawyers for confessed assassin Yigal Amir asked Tel Aviv District Court judges last Sunday to convict their client of "attempted manslaughter or manslaughter" instead of murder.

Although Amir stressed repeatedly during his testimony that he had planned the murder of Yitzhak Rabin and intended to kill him, defence lawyers Shmuel Fleishman and Gabi Shahar tried to prove in the trial's summation that their client did not willfully murder Rabin.

At one point in the defence summation, Shahar even said that it was possible that a second party was involved in the shooting of Rabin, and that Amir did not fire the shots that killed him.

Defence arguments followed District Attorney representative Penina Guy's summation that Amir had carefully planned Rabin's murder several times. Many of her arguments were based on material taped during the questioning of Amir, both by various police divisions and the GSS.

Guy also asked judges Edmond Levy, Oded Mudrich and Saviona Rotlevy to adopt the detailed evaluations given by the three psychiatrists who examined Amir in his prison cell and found him to be perfectly sane and aware of his actions.

Fleishman argued that Amir intended to paralyze Rabin and not kill him, "to put him and the peace process out of action," and therefore the court should convict him on manslaughter and not murder charges. Fleishman added that there was no criminal intent involved in Amir's deeds, and he is not guilty of premeditated murder.

Levy did not set a date for the verdict, but hinted that it would be before Pesach. He asked the defence to prepare any possible character witnesses to appear the same day, before sentencing.

Neo-Nazis jailed

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW – In an unprecedented action by a Russian court, members of a neo-Nazi organization have received long prison sentences.

Igor Pirozhok, 28, the leader of the neo-Nazi group known as the Werewolf Legion, was sentenced last week to five years in prison for hooliganism and inciting racial and ethnic hatred.

Pirozhok was sentenced by the court in Yaroslavl, a city 130 miles north of Moscow.

Another member of the organization, Victor Baranov, 23, received a nine-year prison term for homicide and hooliganism.

The group, which was formed in the spring of 1994 in Moscow, includes about a dozen youths allegedly bent on carrying out acts of terror.

The legion was reported to have set the "final solution of the Jewish question" as one of its major goals.

Shortly after it was organized, the Werewolf Legion allegedly attempted to set fire to the Olympic sports hall in Moscow, which was serving as the site of a messianic Jewish conference.

The group was also reported to have planned a series of arson attacks on movie theaters that were showing the acclaimed Holocaust film Schindler's List.

The Week in Israel

March 11

• The media reported the death of Likud Knesset Member Ariel Weinstein. The Jerusalem-born Weinstein died of cardiac arrest. He was 64 years old. He had served in the Haganah and the IDF and had been a member of the Knesset since 1982.

March 12

• Yediot Aharonot reported that sources in the Foreign Ministry believe that six Persian Gulf Emirates and Saudi Arabia will soon announce the lifting of the Arab boycott. According to information received, the emirates have decided that a full cancellation of the boycott is necessary to fight terrorism and advance the peace process.

March 13

• Maj. Gen. Danny Yatom was widely reported in the media as the leading candidate to become the next head of the Mossad.

March 14

• Eight Israeli soldiers were wounded, two seriously, in a roadside explosion in the security zone in southern Lebanon. The militant Islamic fundamentalist group Hezbollah, claimed responsibility.

March 15

• The following were the results of the Friday Dahaf poll published in Yediot Aharonot: For prime minister: Peres 50 percent, Netanyahu 47 percent. (Peres' popularity increased by four percent from the previous week, while Netanyahu's popularity decreased by two percent.)

For the Knesset: Labor would win 42 seats; Likud-Tsomet-Gesher would win 42 seats; Meretz would win six seats; the National Religious Party would win five seats; Shas and Yehadut Hatorah four seats each; and Moledet would win three seats.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• Around 1,500 people were expected to attend three conferences in Jerusalem, including the eighth International Protea Conference, the 16th International Jerusalem Conference of Mayors and the Conference of the Association of Insurance Agents.

Documentary examines Anne Frank, flaws and all

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A school friend tossed a parcel of food over a barbed wire fence in Bergen-Belsen to Anne Frank but it was caught by another woman who ran away with it.

That is one of the searing moments in the two-hour documentary Anne Frank Remembered at the Bloor Cinema in Toronto until March 28 and currently showing at the Cinema du Parc in Montreal.

Anne Frank missed her chance at life more than once. She, her sister and parents were on the last cattle car train that left Westerbrok camp in Holland for Auschwitz in 1944. At Auschwitz, other Jews from Amsterdam were sent to a work camp where many survived, but Anne had scabies and her mother and sister decided to stay behind with her.

Of course, the main blow fate dealt her was on that August day in 1944 when the Nazis arrested the family in their hiding place in a secret annex of the business Otto Frank ran in Amsterdam.

The documentary, written, directed and produced by Jon Blair, gives a more human look at Anne Frank than the stage play and movie based on her famous diary. It has the first filmed interviews with friends who knew her intimately and with Miep Gies, the Dutch woman employee who brought the family food.

No one has been able to prove whether the Franks were betrayed by former workers or neighbors or whether the carelessness of the annex's occupants was responsible for their discovery. This is one of the little known facts revealed. Another is that Anne had a running battle with her mother and at one time declared in her diary that she was "motherless." This changed during their incarceration at Auschwitz.

A school friend says Anne was a naughty girl who always wanted to be the centre of attention.

Her relations with a 54-year-old dentist, Fritz Pfeffer, who shared her room after being allowed to join the Franks, went sour. He would not give her enough privacy in the room to write her diary. She called him "Dr. Idiot."

Anne had a trick of wiggling her shoulder out of its socket and clicking it back in, one friend said.

The documentary gives passing reference to her attraction to Peter van Pels, the 17-year-old son of Otto Frank's business associate, who was also in hiding, along with his parents. Sections of the diary are quoted which show her curiosity about her own body changes, and about sex.

The film includes portions of letters, never before disclosed, written by Otto Frank to his mother in Switzerland from Auschwitz. He knew that his wife had died, but he thought his daughters had survived.

Among the most moving moments are interviews with a man, who while a fellow prisoner at Auschwitz, reveals that he and Otto Frank played games, recalling snatches of famous symphonies and memories of art exhibitions, to keep their sanity.

It reveals that Otto Frank, who died in 1980, married again after the war, and spent a lot of his time countering the efforts of neo-Nazis who claimed the diary was a hoax.

From Anne Frank Remembered, the 15-year-old girl emerges as a human, rather than a saint, who loved life, despite its horrors. "I didn't know my daughter until I read her diary," Otto Frank said in a 1979 interview.

Retrospective honors Israel's leading lady of the cinema

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A five-day retrospective honoring Israel's leading lady of the cinema, Gila Almagor, will be launched on March 23.

The series is sponsored by Cinematheque Ontario in cooperation with the Toronto Jewish Film Society and Israel's consulate general.

Screenings will take place at Jackson Hall, Art Gallery of Ontario. Altogether, seven movies will be shown. Almagor will personally present the films.

Passover Fever (March 23 at 8:30 p.m. and March 27 at 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m.) is a contemporary comedy about three generations of an extended family giving vent to merriment and sorrow at the Passover table. The ensemble cast is led by Almagor, who plays the matriarch of the clan.

Gila Almagor

The House on Chelouche Street (March 24 at 1 p.m.), set in the waning days of the British Mandate in Palestine, turns on the relationship between a widow (Almagor) and her 15-year-old son in chaotic times.

The Summer of Aviya (March 24, 4 p.m.), based on Almagor's best-selling novel, chronicles one summer in the life of a girl trying to come to terms with her mentally confused and institutionalized mother (Almagor).

Under the Domim Tree (March 24, 7:30 p.m.), the sequel to The Summer of Aviya, focuses on the interconnected lives of four teenagers on a kibbutz who've survived the Holocaust and their friendship with Aviya, a sabra. In a cameo role, Almagor portrays Aviya's mother.

Sh'chur (March 28, 6:30 p.m.) is a portrait of a Moroccan family caught between old values and superstitions and modern Israel. Almagor plays a mother who uses ritual magic to solve the problems swirling around her household.

Life According to Agfa (March 28, 8:45 p.m.) unfolds in a Tel Aviv pub whose clientele is a microcosm of Israeli society. Almagor is the world-weary co-owner of the all-night bar.

Siege (March 31, 7:30 p.m.), the oldest film in the series, was made in 1970, when the Six Day War was still fresh in the minds of Israelis. Almagor is a war widow attempting to break the shackles of the past and move forward.

Novice entrepreneurs create personalized gifts

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sharyn Adler-Gitalis, 38, lost her job as marketing director of the Leah Posluns Theatre when it closed in 1994. But instead of pounding the pavement for another job, Adler-Gitalis became self-employed. She started her own business as a decorative painter.

She had a degree in fine arts and had been painting part time, she said. "When the theatre closed down, I felt this was really something I wanted to pursue full time."

She enrolled in the self-employment assistance program, a year-long federally-funded program run by the YMCA, and last January started her own business, Creative Painted Environment.

Learning to write a business plan helped her clarify her goals and "take them more seriously," she said. "It's challenging for me. I'm an artist, but I need to have the business skills."

Much of her business comes through word of mouth — she has many satisfied clients — she noted. "They call me up and they gush. I feel like I'm doing a real service."

Adler-Gitalis does specialty painted walls — like ragging, marbling, stencilling and murals, and she paints floor cloths and furniture. The furniture painting has led to an important business relationship: Adler-Gitalis paints furniture and fabric for Karen Goldstein, 32, another novice entrepreneur.

Goldstein recently started Karen's Kid's Boutique, which offers higher end speciality and personalized gifts — prices start at $25 — for babies and children.

The two women, who coincidentally live near each other, met at the self-employment assistance program and have become close friends. Since they're in compatible businesses, they attend trade shows together and meet regularly to give each other moral support.

Goldstein had been working in human resources as a recruiter, but said she "found the corporate world too stuffy."

She had a need to express her creative skills, she said. "I had strengths I hadn't thought of tapping into. One day, a friend of mine suggested the self-employment assistance program."

She decided to open a boutique offering higher-end specialized gifts, because she was always finding them and buying them for other people, she said. "So many people were asking me where I bought the gifts that I thought, instead of sending them to someone else, I'll do it myself."

Personalized gifts for children, such as embroidered terry cloth items, bibs and quilts, and painted wooden items like toy boxes, benches and picnic tables are a big trend in the United States, she said.

"I have an embroidery person, Sharyn does the painting and another Jewish woman makes mezuzah covers. With personalized gifts, the choices are endless."

Goldstein, who works out of her home, said most of her business comes through word of mouth, but she also tries to promote the boutique by telling as many people as possible about the products she carries. While the business is progressing steadily, she said she expects that it will take at least two more years to get firmly established.

The pay-off is worth the time and effort, she added. "I'm doing something I enjoy ... I'm following a vision. I equate myself to my grandparents coming to Canada and building everything from scratch."

Firm applies business sense to help arts schools succeed

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

NORTH YORK — Arts Excelleration is geared to ensuring the financial success of independent schools of the arts, says president Gail Aiken.

Unlike other businesses, schools for dance, music, theatre and visual arts which operate for profit have traditionally lacked services to help them improve their administration and marketability, she notes.

Arts teachers love what they are doing, but "don't know what they don't know," Aiken says.

As a former student and teacher at the National Ballet School, who also had her own ballet academy in Whitby for 11 years, she has "been there."

Intensive accounting and business studies plus solid artistic experience earned her the position of administrator at the Royal Winnipeg Ballet School, where she served from 1992 until 1994.

Returning to hometown Toronto, she founded Arts Exceleration. "I have a clear understanding of both the arts and business," she says. "I can relate to my clients and help them in a practical way."

She will guide a client in establishing an arts school, but says that even for established schools, the major problem is financial.

"These people are not making the kind of living they should with their years of training and effort, dedication and expertise."

She focuses on improving enrolment, payment plans, budgeting, time management, marketing, customer service.

Positive and committed, Aiken also offers seminars. Her clients include Ryerson Theatre School dance department, the Cecchetti Society International Dance Association, The Royal Academy of Dancing and the York University Dance Department.

"To my knowledge, nobody is doing what I'm doing," she says. "I provide a unique service. My background is dance, but what I have to offer is for all the arts because marketing is marketing."

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Irving & Leonard, Up Close: David, son of Irving Layton, the Montreal poet, once told his father, "I've never read any of your poems," evidently hoping to shock him into coming down from some imagined throne on Mount Olympus. "My father ... performs nonstop. His role is the potent genius. He truly believes that he belongs in the pantheon with Socrates and Homer and Dante and Shakespeare, and he never ceases to live up to his status," writes the younger Layton in a highly revealing and personal essay about his father, himself and his godfather, the pop idol Leonard Cohen, in this month's issue of Saturday Night magazine.

Those familiar with the work of Layton or Cohen will find this rivetting reading, even if it deflates two large literary legends. Layton, Sr., the elder poet, comes across as gruff, pompous and misanthropic, while Cohen – the mystical troubador, the Byronic "golden boy" – comes across as gentle, elusive, and all too human. Intriguingly, David describes travels through Asia and the Aegean with his family as a child, as well as various visits to Cohen and his lady friends Suzanne and Marianne, for whom the renowned poet wrote the famous songs.

David's complaint is that his father got stuck in the dual role of poet and lover of women, allegedly to the detriment of his dual role as father and husband. David's literary salvo seems like just another of the psychic slings and arrows that sometimes fly between father and son. But it also casts an interesting light on Layton Sr.'s reported opinion that sons approach fathers with one of two objects in mind – either to bless them or to kill them.

This cover story is well written but begs the question: Did Layton Jr. pay too much for his 15 minutes in the literary limelight?

Klezmer Music Workshop: Learn the rudiments of klezmer from one of Canada's best known proponents of this potent style of music handed down from the Eastern Europe of long ago. David Buchbinder, leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, is leading a six-week course on the joys of playing Yiddish traditional music.

According to Buchbinder, who is also artistic director of the Ashkenaz festival of Yiddish culture, classes will be held in an ensemble setting and will cover the basics of klezmer, including rhythm, melody and ornaments. The course is open to musicians (on any instruments) aged 14 and up, possessing a comfortable familiarity with their instruments. An ability to read music is helpful but not essential.

Two sessions, starting March 31, 4 to 5:30 p.m., or April 1, 7 to 8:30 p.m. At the Bloor Street JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. Fee: members $80, non-members $100. 416-924-6211.

The Israel Museum: Excavations at Ma'ale Modi'in have recently unearthed a vessel containing 143 Roman silver coins dating from Nero to Hadrian, and two gold denarii from the time of Vespasian and Trajan. One of the coins is a rare golden coin minted in the days of Vespasian in commemoration of the conquest of Jerusalem in 70 CE, commissioned for the victory celebrations in Rome.

The coins are displayed in the Coin Gallery at the Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

Historical Russian Concert: A historical recreation of a concert given in St. Petersburg in 1908 is bringing together Cantor Louis Danto, Senia Trubashnik, Natalya Tyomkina and Joseph Peleg at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Bathurst Jewish Centre, 4588 Bathurst St., North York.

Entitled The Russian Connection: The Origins of Jewish Art Music, the concert features art songs and instrumental works that reflect an early Yiddish renaissance that was tragically stifled. March 27, 8 p.m. Adults, $20. Joan Tooke, 416-636-2145.

Survivor's daughter tells her story

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB news editor

TORONTO – "When asked if there was any story I wouldn't do [on my show], I replied, 'The only thing I wouldn't do is a comedy about the Holocaust,' " says Adrienne Clarkson in her introduction to Punch Me In The Stomach. "I've lived to eat my words."

Punch Me In The Stomach (CBC TV, March 27 at 8 p.m. EST) is not a rip-roaring comedy as much as it is a profile of what it's like to grow up as a survivor's daughter.

Deb Filler, who wrote and stars in this TV adaptation of her one-character play (which played in Toronto three years ago), is the daughter of Saul Filler, a Polish born survivor of Auschwitz. Her parents (her mother's family left Nazi Germany in 1939) met and married in New Zealand, where Filler grew up. Filler plays all 36 characters – herself, family members and others – in a mixture of biographical stand-up and skit routines.

Punch Me In The Stomach was inspired after Filler visited Auschwitz and Theresienstadt with her father. Saul was somewhat of a celebrity in New Zealand as a survivor who gave speeches and appeared on television.

One poignant moment which summarizes the theme of the program comes when Filler plays her father giving a television interview about his Auschwitz reminiscences.

"You had to keep your sense of humor," he says. "We had to laugh – what else could you do? We laughed the whole first night in Auschwitz."

In another skit, she dramatizes an argument her dad had with a tour guide when they visited Theresienstadt. The tour guide is explaining emotionlessly how the Nazis kept meticulous records.

"That's impossible," Filler says, acting as her dad. "We came here on a long march from Auschwitz at the end of the war. Ninety-thousand of us left and 200 arrived. They died on the road ... the soldiers themselves were starving. Nobody was writing numbers. They put us here in this cell for three days. It was full of dead bodies. Nobody was counting them. Listen, if I was to have died here, nobody would have known."

She relates that as her dad bought postcards from a kiosk outside the camp, she had to use the washroom. It was a filthy washroom and as she went to pull the flushing chain, it broke in her hands. She stood on the bowl trying in vain to reattach it and her foot slipped into the bowl.

"I started to laugh. I stopped myself. I can't laugh here, I'm in a concentration camp. I walked out of the bathroom into the sunlight... I was still holding the chain in my hand when my dad looked at me and started to laugh. We were laughing so hard, we couldn't stop."

Although there are humorous moments in this show – particularly her reminiscences of growing up in New Zealand – Punch Me In The Stomach – is more about humor than it is funny, and it shows how laughter can be, in fact, the best medicine.

Disabled children have 'elevated souls,' rabbi says

By LESLIE KATZ
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

BURLINGAME – Shortly after his son Shlomo was born, Rabbi Baruch Rabinowitz phoned Jerusalem to tell his own rebbe and mentor that he had a new baby boy.

"Mazel tov," the rebbe responded enthusiastically.

After a short pause, Rabinowitz revealed that his fourth child had been born with Down's syndrome. Without a moment's hesitation, the rebbe responded: "It comes for you a double mazel tov," he said. "Mazel tov, mazel tov."

Rabbi Rabinowitz – who spoke at the International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics in Burlingame last month – couldn't believe his ears. Did his rebbe hear him right? How could the birth of this disabled child, whose diagnosis had caused the rabbi and his wife such pain and grief, warrant a double dose of congratulations?

The rebbe proceeded to explain. The child had not been sent as punishment to his parents, he stressed, but as a tafkid, or mission, for them.

"He told me this child has been designated specifically for this family," recalled Rabbi Rabinowitz, "and that the child would actualize potential in us and in those around us beyond our expectations."

Judaism teaches that some children are sent by God, the rebbe said, to teach the world compassion, appreciation of individuality and gratitude for the simple things in life. For that reason, he said, Shlomo and other developmentally disabled children are gifted with "elevated souls."

The rebbe "promised me that not only will I love [Shlomo]. I'll be happy with him," Rabbi Rabinowitz said. The rebbe also promised that Shlomo "will be a source of naches" (joy).

At the time, Rabbi Rabinowitz was still reeling from the news of his son's retardation, and those were hard words for him to comprehend.

More than five years later, the Brooklyn-based Orthodox rabbi can't seem to tell enough stories about the happiness his spunky, loving son brings to those around him.

Every Shabbat, while Shlomo's siblings discuss the week's Torah portion, the youngster acts it out. On Sukkot, he can't get the lulav fast enough. And when Rabbi Rabinowitz takes Shlomo to synagogue, the child gleefully shouts out "amen."

On Simchat Torah, Shlomo dances with such joyful fervor that when Rabbi Rabinowitz doesn't bring him to services, congregants ask, "Where's Shlomo? He's so much fun."

"He remains developmentally behind," Rabbi Rabinowitz said, "but he's funny, he's vibrant, he's happy, he's special. Oh is he special."

In the years since Shlomo's birth – years when the child endured open-heart surgery and a number of serious illnesses – Rabbi Rabinowitz and his wife Miriam have travelled a path paved with emotions ranging from terror to elation.

The rabbi shared their remarkable journey with an audience of several hundred in a talk titled, The Jewish Child with Developmental Disabilities: The Impact, the Challenge, the Response.

The lecture followed a related talk by Dr. N. Paul Rosman, a Boston pediatric neurologist who spoke of the pre- and post-natal challenges facing families of children with abnormal brains.

For both the families and the disabled children themselves, Rosman said, coming to terms with the reality of neurological malfunction is a lengthy, taxing but sometimes extremely gratifying process.

Rabbi Rabinowitz spoke eloquently about that process. When Shlomo was first born, Rabbi Rabinowitz found himself assaulted by an array of feelings. He asked, "Why me?" He denied the reality of what had happened. He felt grief, self-pity, fear and at times, despair.

His wife was equally pained and confused. "She said the words 'mazel tov' were like daggers in her heart," the rabbi recalled.

But everything began to change, following Rabbi Rabinowitz' conversation with his rebbe. As time passed and the Rabinowitzes learned more about their child and his disability, they found that they no longer wished he had been born without Down's syndrome. They simply loved him for who he was.

"What began as a tragedy has been transformed into a fuller appreciation of all aspects of human life," Rabbi Rabinowitz said.

Eventually, the couple became activists, forming Torah Alliance of Families of Kids with Disabilities (TAFKID), a support network through which they often speak publicly about their experiences.

Part of their crusade involves raising awareness of the issue within the Jewish community, which Rabbi Rabinowitz says is "still asleep" when it comes to fully including developmentally disabled children and adults.

But ultimately Rabbi Rabinowitz believes that Shlomo's story and others like it are relevant to anyone facing a challenge of faith.

"We do not pick and choose in God's world," he said. "We believe that all that God does is for good, for our benefit, our growth."

Hadassah educates students to detect breast cancer

By DEBORAH SHAPIRO
Baltimore Jewish Times

BALTIMORE — Filing into the dance studio of their all-girls school and receiving plastic Check It Out information bags from Hadassah volunteers, the 140 members of Bryn Mawr's junior and senior classes quickly realized that this was not going to be a typical school assembly.

Bryn Mawr is one of nine local private schools that Hadassah's Baltimore chapter is visiting this year, as part of the organization's national Check It Out program.

Through the program, high school girls learn about breast cancer from a panel of speakers, including a health care provider and a breast cancer survivor.

Bryn Mawr senior, Kierston Woods, who spoke at the assembly, said, "It's important for students to hear about breast cancer. We haven't had much information about it."

Marsha Oakly, a 10-year breast cancer survivor who volunteers for the Arm-in-Arm breast cancer support group, spoke about being diagnosed with cancer at age 38, when her three sons were under the age of 11.

Oakly said she had no family history of breast cancer and "was active and ate the right things."

Paula Pearl, a nurse practitioner at the University of MarylandCancer Centre, told students that "it makes a difference when cancer is picked up early."

Using a small model of a breast, she showed the audience members how to perform monthly self-examinations.

"I don't expect you to start doing this now, but if you practise every two or three months, you can get used to it for when you need it," Pearl said.

She told students that one out of eight women will get breast cancer, with the greatest risk among women over 50.

The Check It Out program began four years ago in Corpus Christi, Texas. Baltimore became the third Hadassah chapter in the United States to take part in the program.

Big goal gives Israel its first-ever hockey medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was high drama in Sofia as a goal in overtime gave Israel its first-ever medal in an international hockey event.

Only two years after entering junior competition, the boys in blue won a bronze medal as they edged the host Bulgarians 4-3 in the International Ice Hockey Federation's (IIHF) European Junior Championships, Pool D.

The goal came about two-and-a-half minutes into the extra period as Jonathan Goldberg's long wrist shot from just inside the blueline eluded the Bulgarian puck-stopper.

"As you can imagine, it was pretty incredible for the boys," said Oded Orgil, co-head coach of the team. "There were gloves in the air, sticks on the ice and they tackled each other."

"I can't explain [the feeling]," said Goldberg, a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. "It's everybody's dream to score like that to win the big game. Everyone came and jumped on me."

Adding icing to Israel's cake was the announcement that Sergei Ostrovski, 16, was the tournament's top netminder. In addition, Israel won the Fair Play Cup for the lowest penalty minutes.

As if that wasn't enough, Israel's hockey program got another shot in the arm when it learned that the senior Greek team was stripped of its victories at an IIHF qualifying tournament in Metulla held earlier this year.

That means the second place team — Israel — will take Greece's place at an IIHF Pool C tournament in Lithuania later this month and will also play Yugoslavia in an Olympic-qualifying match.

Orgil said Greece was declared ineligible for the tournament in Lithuania and for the Olympic Games in Japan because it used ineligible players at Metulla. It's believed two players who bolstered the Greek team, a University of Toronto goaltender and a Provincial Junior A player from Ontario, had not obtained transfer cards entitling them to play, Orgil said.

Meanwhile, two players who spearheaded the Israeli juniors, Alon Eizenman, 17, and Yaron Orgil, 17, Oded's brother, have been asked to join the senior squad in Lithuania. Oded will participate (as a player) in the tournament and two Israeli skaters playing in Canada, Eugene (Yvgeny) Feldman and Sergei Gudzik, have also been asked to bolster the Israeli squad.

Nine youngsters from the Toronto area were key members of the 18-man junior squad, Orgil said. They all were either born in Israel or had a parent born in the Jewish state, making them eligible to play.

Goaltending, which Orgil had feared would be a weak spot, was solid thanks to Ostrovski and backup Yossi Asraf, 15. Ostrovski is originally from the former Soviet Union while Asraf is a sabra who plays in Metulla.

The two shared a shutout in Israel's first game as they beat Greece 5-0. The Israelis started slowly and played tentatively but improved as the game wore on, Orgil said.

In Game 2 against Yugoslavia, Israel dropped its high-pressure, 2-1-2 forechecking system for a more defensive 1-2-2 alignment. Israel played well early on and earned a 2-1 second period lead.

Israel missed a glorious opportunity to pad its lead when Eizenman, later named Israel's top player in the tournament, was stopped on a penalty shot.

He got a second chance at a goal when the referee ruled the goalie had left the crease prior to the whistle. But again Eizenman went for the deke instead of the shot and the netminder stoned him.

Yugoslavia's tying goal in the third period seemed to deflate the Israelis who went on to lose, 6-2.

With a 1-1 record, Israel entered the medal round (no, that's not a misprint) against Bulgaria. (The Netherlands beat Yugoslavia for the gold.) The Israelis were sluggish at the start and fell behind 2-0 on two fairly weak shots, Orgil said.

Nevertheless Orgil and co-head coach Sergei Martin remained confident because the team had generated several good scoring chances. Israel shortened its bench to give Eizenman and Orgil more ice time and the Israelis' speed and ability to break past the Bulgarians' 1-2-2 alignment gave them plenty of chances, Orgil said.

Israel's puckhandling and composure paid off as they tallied three times in a little over six minutes in the middle frame to go ahead 3-2.

The team played well in the third period but then, with only 3½ minutes to go, one of Israel's defencemen was caught pinching at the blueline and Bulgaria broke out on a three-on-one. Goal.

Israel's coaches called a time-out to settle down the team and regulation time ended in a draw.

Facing a 10-minute sudden death overtime followed by a shootout, when Goldberg, who plays left wing for the Thornhill Rebels, took a pass from Eizenman and shot for the far corner. The goalie got his stick on it but it deflected into the top corner.

GOAAAAAALLLLL!!!!!!!!

Eizenman's assist on the winning goal gave him six points for the three-game tournament (3 G, 3 A), tops on the team. Orgil tallied two goals and two assists for second in team scoring.

Soccer partnership reached

TORONTO — The Toronto Shooting Stars indoor soccer club have a new logo and a new broadcast partner.

Club president and CEO Francois Glasman announced last week that The Fan 590 radio station will broadcast Shooting Stars home games in their inaugural season beginning in October.

In addition, the all-sports radio station will air promotional announcements, interviews and a weekly show on the soccer club.

"This is thrilling to have The Fan 590 with us at Maple Leaf Gardens to help bring the newest, hottest game to our city," Glasman said. "We look forward to developing a long and mutually beneficial partnership."

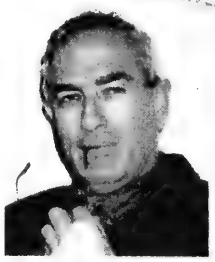
Holocaust museum designed for kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter



Simcha Stein

TORONTO — Holocaust education can be overwhelming for adults, let alone children. A children's Holocaust museum which opened last year on a Western Galilee kibbutz addresses that problem with a gentle approach to the subject.

"Our museum is full of colors," said Simcha Stein, referring to Yad Layeled's stained glass windows depicting butterflies and flowers drawn by children in Theresienstadt. "Kids need a starting point."

Stein, executive director of the museums at Lohamei Haghetaot and Yad Layeled, was in Toronto recently to meet with supporters (Canadian Friends of Yad Layeled) and students at Bialik Hebrew Day School, the only Canadian school thus far among a far-flung international group to forge links with the museum.

Yad Layeled was built alongside the Ghetto Fighters' House, the main museum located at Kibbutz Lohamei Haghetaot, a kibbutz founded by Holocaust survivors, many of whom had been in the Jewish resistance movement.

The Ghetto Fighters' House, established on a modest scale in 1949, now has a vast archival collection, an educational unit with training programs for teachers, students and soldiers, and 16 permanent exhibitions spread over four floors. Bialik's involvement includes the exchange of educational materials.

Stein calls Yad Layeled, built as a living memorial to the 1.5 million Jewish children who perished in the Holocaust, "the pearl in the crown" of the museum complex.

Adult-oriented Holocaust museums will frighten small children, he feels. Even Yad Layeled is geared only to those age 10 and up, although slightly younger children might be brought in at the parents' discretion, Stein said in an interview.

"We emphasize not just the Holocaust, but the Jewish struggle for survival," he said.

The museum has a strong educational component and most of its visitors have been school groups. The majority of its funding comes from Israel's Ministry of Education.

In addition to exhibits, there are nine learning stations and young visitors can participate in workshops at the end of their visit, expressing their feelings about what they have seen, through play, poetry, art or other media.

In an effort to make the information more accessible, museum organizers have focused on personalizing the experience and emphasizing aspects of life that today's children can identify with, such as games and birthday celebrations. Visitors learn about individual children and families, and have the opportunity to write to a Holocaust survivor who will answer their letter.

"Jewish children have to understand the Holocaust at the level of their own experience," said Lynne Mitchell of the Canadian Friends of Yad Layeled.

"We cannot talk about Jewish heritage without understanding what happened in the Holocaust," said Stein.

Dear Susan,

I would like to send my 4-year-old to camp. How do I know if he is ready?

Dear Reader,

It is important for a child's first camp experience to be a good one. The decision whether he should be sent should be based principally on whether he is ready, emotionally and developmentally, to take the step. However, it must also be based on his desire to go, and you must be sure that the final decision reflects his actual wishes and not just yours.

You can begin by engaging him in general conversation about what he thinks camp is all about. Having him tell you what he thinks it is will reveal much about how he feels about it. You can then go on to ask him if he would be interested in checking out camps with you. If he is hesitant, explore the reasons why – is his reluctance based on a lack of knowledge, or does it stem from more basic reservations about leaving home. If it is the latter, it is unlikely that he is ready.

You can help your child make the transition into readiness by giving him practice leaving home. Encourage him to play at friends' houses for extended periods of time. At the same time, make sure to attend to his emotional needs when saying hello and goodbye. Explore his feelings about being away from home, and have him articulate his biggest concerns. By offering support and understanding for his feelings, while encouraging him to confront and articulate those feelings, you can ensure that he does not experience any shame about his fears while at the same time helping him to transcend them.

Four and five year olds typically have one foot in the door and one foot out. They want to be independent, yet find that dependence is still very much an emotional and practical reality. By recognizing that both realities exist and helping your child work through them, you will help ensure a smooth transition through this significant developmental stage.

HERB CAPLAN SELLS SUB-ZERO FOR LESS

1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

BAKED BREAST OF CHICKEN

4 whole chicken breasts, boned & halved
1 cup soup nut crumbs
1 tsp ground ginger
1 tsp garlic powder
1/2 tsp salt
1/4 tsp white pepper
2 eggs, well beaten
1 cup apricot preserves
1/2 cup white wine
2 tblsp pareve margarine

Preheat oven to 350°F. Rinse chicken breasts with cold water and dry well with paper towels. Combine soup nut crumbs, ginger, garlic powder, salt, and pepper in a shallow dish. Dip each chicken part in beaten egg, then in crumb mixture. Arrange in a single layer in baking pan. Combine preserves, wine, and margarine. Microwave on high setting for 5 min. or bring to a boil in small saucepan. Pour over the chicken breasts and bake for 1 hr. Serves 6. This may be made a day ahead and reheated.

HONEYDEW

The only thing better than the subtle taste of a honeydew melon is its flair for complementing other foods. The perfect honeydew is ivory white or greenish turning creamy white with pale streaks and a waxy feel to the surface. But it isn't usually ready to eat when you buy it. Let your honeydew stand at room temperature until there's a lovely fragrance and the skin is creamy white. To serve, cut in half, scoop out the stringy centre and seeds and cut in wedges.

Tension on Lebanon border

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah declared last week that attacks against the IDF and South Lebanese Army (SLA) would continue, despite Israel's threats to retaliate.

He also warned that Hezbollah would respond with Katyusha rockets on the Galilee if the IDF shelled villages north of the security zone and harmed residents.

"The only way for the enemy to avoid harm to its settlements is not to harm our civilians," said Nasrallah.

Interior Minister Ehud Barak, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, and OC Northern Command Amiram Levine were among the thousands to attend Capt. Salah Zeidan's funeral last week at the Beit Jann Military Cemetery. Zeidan was killed by a Hezbollah suicide bomber.

Col. K, who had been in the caravan's first jeep, eulogized Zeidan, saying, "He was constantly concerned that his soldiers received everything, newspapers, food. He would check the trucks

Territories remain closed

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Citing reports that Islamic militants were planning additional terror attacks against Israel, Prime Minister Shimon Peres said last Sunday the closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip would remain in place.

Peres also told the weekly cabinet meeting that soldiers at crossings between Israel and the territories had been instructed to check ambulances bringing Palestinians in need of medical treatment into Israel.

The directive was issued after explosives were reportedly discovered on a pregnant Palestinian woman who was being brought to an Israeli hospital.

Israel imposed the closure Feb. 25, after the first of four Hamas suicide bombings in nine days killed scores of Israelis.

In a related development, a spokesperson for Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat confirmed that Arafat remains committed to amending the Palestine National Council (PNC) Charter by May 7, despite the fact that he views the closure of the territories as a violation of Israel's commitment to the Palestinians.

Nabil Abourdenah said an adviser of Arafat's, Khaled Salam, was not speaking for the chairman

Passover Food: More sumptuous recipes inside

The News In Brief

CANADA

Concern Over Kalejs

MONTREAL – A delegation from Canadian Jewish Congress held its first meeting with Lucienne Robillard, federal minister of citizenship and immigration.

Among the topics dealt with was Congress' frustration over the way in which the case involving suspected Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs is being handled.

BGU Dean To Visit

TORONTO – Prof. Shraga Segal, dean of the faculty of health sciences at Ben-Gurion University, an expert in immunology, immunogenetics and tumor immunology, will be the guest of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University April 15 to 24.

ISRAEL

Private Cars In Jordan

JERUSALEM – Israel and Jordan have agreed to allow private vehicles and buses to cross their border starting next month.

The agreement, which was reached this week by the Israeli-Jordanian Joint Transport Committee in Amman, is part of a broader pact that also covers trade issues.

Abraham Fund Grants

JERUSALEM – The Abraham Fund has presented $826,000 in grants to projects promoting Jewish-Arab coexistence in Israel.

The grants will help fund joint educational programs for Jewish and Arab teenagers, social programs in health and community development, and activities advancing equal opportunity for Arab citizens.

Hamas' Homes Destroyed

JERUSALEM – Hoping to deter more suicide bombings, Israel has resumed the demolition of Hamas terrorists' West Bank homes.

Three homes were destroyed after the High Court of Justice rejected seven appeals against the demolition policy.

Police also demolished the home of one of the most wanted Hamas members, Mohi Eddin Sharif, known as the successor of Yehiya "The Engineer," Ayyash, Hamas's former explosives expert killed in Gaza earlier this year.

Defence Pact 'Premature'

JERUSALEM – A defence treaty between Israel and the United States would be "premature" at this time, President Bill Clinton informed Prime Minister Shimon Peres last week, Israeli officials say.

The conversation between the two was held on Air Force One on the way back from the Sharm el-Sheikh anti-terrorism summit.

Israeli Youths Have AIDS

JERUSALEM — Some 70 youngsters are known to be "living with AIDS," in the country, the head of the Israel AIDS Task Force said last week, and the majority are able to stay in school.

Pilot Training Course

JERUSALEM – Ten female IDF soldiers will begin the air force's pilot training course shortly, Israel Radio reported.

The soldiers were accepted following a successful appeal to the High Court of Justice challenging the former Air Force practice of not considering female candidates.

WORLD

Anti-terrorism Aid

WASHINGTON – In the immediate aftermath of the fourth and deadliest terrorist attack in Israel earlier this month, President Bill Clinton sent the Jewish state the most sophisticated anti-terrorism tools in the American arsenal.

Israeli and American officials have crafted a $100 million counter-terrorism package that includes bomb detection equipment, the most advanced sensor machines – like the kind found in airports – border-detection devices and the training to use them.

Defamation Case Settled

SYDNEY, Australia – The U.S.-based Lyndon LaRouche group has agreed to settle a defamation case initiated by a prominent member of the Melbourne Jewish community.

As part of the settlement, the extremist organization will pay legal costs and publish an apology to Michael Danby.

Bombing Remembered

BUENOS AIRES – Argentine Jews, joined by Israeli and American representatives, marked the 20 months that have elapsed since the bombing of the Jewish headquarters here.

As more than 500 people gathered outside the Argentine Supreme Court to commemorate the July 18, 1994, bombing, Argentina joined with two neighboring countries to sign an agreement designed to crack down on terrorists operating in the region.

Extradition Sought

ROME – Italy will seek the extradition of a Palestinian convicted of the 1985 Achille Lauro hijacking who was recaptured in Spain.

The chief of the Italian police anti-terrorism division said the Italian Justice Ministry was preparing an extradition request for Youssef Magied al-Molqi, adding that the request could take up to 45 days to process.

Police were also investigating several people as accomplices in Molqi's escape.

Molqi, 33, fled a church-run shelter in Italy on Feb. 28 while on a 12-day good-conduct leave from prison, where he was serving a 30-year sentence. He was recaptured March 22 in a Spanish resort.

Forum Criticized

PARIS – Israel has complained to UNESCO about a symposium on Jerusalem held under its auspices that was organized by pro-Palestinian groups.

The conference was organized by the Forum for Citizens of the Mediterranean, a group backed by pro-Palestinian French groups.

In its final declaration issued this week, the conference claimed that Israel held too much sway over Jerusalem's fate.

Arafat Renames Palestinian Areas

JERUSALEM – Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has announced that areas under his control should from now on be referred to in official documents as "Palestine."

Arafat's office said this week in a statement that the West Bank would be called the Northern District and the Gaza Strip would be referred to as the Gaza District.

The terms "Gaza Strip" and "West Bank" are remnants from British control of the region, the statement said, adding that the new names would reflect the realities of Palestinian self-rule.

Racial, ethnic prejudice thriving: report

By PAUL McKEAGUE
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Racial and ethnic prejudice are thriving in Canada and threaten to undermine the country's strong record of human rights, the Canadian Human Rights Commission warned.

As he released the commission's annual report for 1995, chief commissioner Max Yalden cited B'nai Brith Canada's recent audit, which said that reported incidents of anti-Semitic harrassment are on the rise.

"These are problems that we think are serious both in the short term and long term," Yalden told a press conference. "The major problem for us is that there are such incidents at all in a country like Canada which prides itself on its human rights record."

He noted that 1995 was the 50th anniversary of the defeat of Nazi Germany, but it saw fresh evidence that "racism and xenophobia are constants of the human condition."

And instead of showing a firm commitment to fight such phenomena, Canada seemed "at odds with itself and short of sympathy for vulnerable minorities," the commission reported.

"There is a marked impression that the tide of positive change in human rights matters in Canada could be on the turn unless we are prepared to be more vigilant in their defence than we have been these past 12 months," the report said.

Its concerns were fuelled by signs of a backlash against immigrants in Toronto and Vancouver. The commission also said Canada is still failing to meet its moral obligation to natives.

With neither proper control over their own affairs nor equal access to the benefits of Canadian life, their situation is Canada's "most serious human rights problem," Yalden said.

The commission also expressed concerns about the spread of hate propaganda through the Internet that were similar to those voiced by B'nai Brith Canada.

The commission vowed to take action on well-founded complaints about hate messages emanating from Internet sites in Canada. But there's probably not much can be done about signals from abroad unless the Canadian government joins with other countries to tackle the issue, Yalden said.

The commission noted that "even in Canada, the somewhat chaotic condition of the Internet will not make hatemongering an easy target."

The commission has been successful in shutting down telephone hate lines of white supremacy groups, but "the underlying activity persists," it noted. "One suspects that telephonic hate messages are just the tip of the larger iceberg."

Noting that intolerance has been called "the growth industry of the 1990s," the commission said countries must fight it with every means available.

Yalden was troubled by the Chrétien government's indefinite postponement of its commitment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

In the last 10 years, seven justice ministers have vowed to deal with the matter and then failed to deliver, he said. The commission called the lack of protection for gays and lesbians "little better than acquiescence in intolerance."

At the same time, the Somalia inquiry has not only raised disturbing questions about discriminatory attitudes within the Canadian Armed Forces but also about the military's "readiness to correct them," the commission noted.

It cited concerns expressed by the Canadian Jewish Congress about the "broader implications of allowing known racists to serve in the Canadian forces."

Jerusalem's splendor

Politics pervades Israel. It is as constant as the sunrise.

Because people are virtually wired into the news on an hourly basis, their nerve endings jangle with the latest political developments in their local communities, in the Knesset, in Europe and in the United States. (Canada is generally included in the United States.) Everyone has an opinion. No one is shy about expressing it.

Thus, it was a refreshing change for our media group to spend the second of our two field trips visiting primarily "non-political" places. Strictly speaking, the term "non-political" is inaccurate because the places we visited were financial beneficiaries of The Jewish Agency for Israel. And as even the most naive of all neophytes undoubtedly knows, The Jewish Agency is and always has been the organizational manifestation of a very "political place."

Nevertheless, I use the term because we met with individuals who were themselves, at least in our encounters, decidedly non-political and who told us stories about non-political experiences.

We visited a place and a program called Elul. It is an acronym for the Hebrew phrase: "Elu v'elu divrei Elokim chaim." (These and these are the words of the living God.) Elul is a beit midrash for Israeli men and women from all religious and economic walks of life. Here, the secular meet the observant and together, they gather over the pages of classic Jewish text.

Elul is attempting to be a bridge and a sanctuary, a place of introduction and a place of familiarity. It holds a door open to the youth of Israel for whom Judaism is, ironically and sadly, unexplored territory. They are trying, by example, to reach younger generations of fellow Israelis.

On both field trips, Yoni Shapira, a many-generation Jerusalemite, was our guide. Like most Israeli male guides, it seems, he sported a thick bushy moustache, from underneath which he often flashed an engaging, wide, white-toothed smile. Due to various stints as a shaliach in Canada, Australia and the United States, his English was accented with a melange of different pronunciations. His sense of authority was reinforced by a calm, relaxed composure and a tall, confident posture. As we drove and walked to our various destinations, he always filled in the spaces of the familiar roads we travelled with interesting, not readily-known facts from off the beaten track.

Our last stop with him was on Mount Scopus. We went to the campus of Hebrew University, to an alcove hewn into the rock at a high point on the hill looking south and southwest onto the Old City of Jerusalem and beyond. It was late in the afternoon. The sun was already low in the western sky, partially hidden behind a horizontal drapery of orange and red clouds. Below us lay the valley beige and green, pale blue and gold. The Temple Mount sparkled. We sat on stone benches of concentric half circles. We were all tired.

Shapira told us of a man from the Carpathian mountains in Hungary, Avigdor Feuerstein, who had fought in World War I, survived its gruesome inhumanity and then decided to walk to Jerusalem. Like most biblical travellers to Jerusalem he approached the Holy City from the north, from Mount Scopus. As he descended the southern face of the mountain, the vista he beheld was the very sight which at that moment lay in all its pre-twilight splendor before us.

So moved was young Feuerstein by the ethereal beauty of what he saw, he penned a poem and called it, appropriately, Yerushalayim. It begins "Me'al pisgat har hatsofim" - from the high summit of Mount Scopus. It was eventually to become, until The Six Day War, the most famous song about Jerusalem. It remains still, one of the most beautiful songs about Jerusalem. Feuerstein soon changed his name to Hameiri. He became a journalist, poet, novelist, translator and eventually, winner of the Israel Prize.

His Jerusalem roots sentimentally exposed, Shapira told the story of Hameiri with exceptional tenderness, carefully adding many of the details of the soldier's journey from Europe and of the hardship of his new life in the nascent Jewish state. The last detail he filled in for us was that Hameiri was his grandfather.

Undoubtedly, it was due to the combination of the feelings of pleasant end-of-day fatigue, the dramatic ending of Shapira's story and the lovely, serene sunset settling upon Jerusalem before our eyes, that we all fell into a goose-bumpy silence. And then, as if in a Frank Capra film, one of the women sitting in the back row began to sing "Me'al pisgat har hatsofim". Soon everyone was singing "From the high summit of Mount Scopus" from the high summit of Mount Scopus. It was a rare moment.

The notebook of my participation in Jerusalem in January 1996 in The Sixth International Conference of the Jewish Media is now closed.

Zundel request denied

TORONTO — Ernst Zundel's bid for Canadian citizenship was dealt a blow last week when a Federal Court refused to review a finding by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) that he is a threat to Canada's security.

Instead, the court sent the matter back to the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), which heard Zundel's appeal from the CSIS decision on Monday.

Zundel has been convicted in his native Germany of publishing material denying the Holocaust. Jewish groups have repeatedly urged Ontario's attorney general to charge Zundel under the federal anti-hate law, but no charges have been forthcoming.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada applauded the CSIS finding on Zundel.

NCJW plans to deliver over 2,000 Passover boxes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section (NCJW), launched its first ever Passover food drive in 1984 by delivering 300 boxes of Passover food.

This year, volunteers of the food drive, co-sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education, Jewish Family & Child Service, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and NCJW expect to deliver more than 2,000 Passover boxes to people of all ages, all over Toronto.

At the recent launching of this year's drive, over 100 boxes were packed by volunteers, some as young as three or four years old, to be delivered by volunteer drivers on March 31. Boxes include such items as matzah, a Haggadah, matzah meal, matzahball soup or matzahball mix and chicken soup, potato pancakes or kugel, gefilte fish, tuna, coffee or tea, jello, cans or jars of soup, candles and cookies or chocolate.

"This is not a food drive," said Gita Arnold, chair of the NCJW, Toronto Section board. "There is not enough food to last the eight days of Passover, but what we do, is deliver enough food to enable every Jew to celebrate Passover with dignity."

The highlight of the official launch was the presentation of a $10,000 cheque from the Moess Chittin Fund of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, the same fund that collects money to send Passover food to Cuba.

"Part of the fund's money comes here and the rest goes towards sending food to Cuba, [that country's] only source of Passover food. The community response to our drive has always been excellent, but each year it becomes more difficult to ensure that enough boxes are sent out," said Arnold.

Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director, Jewish Board of Education, said he was delighted with the joint effort that goes into the Passover drive.

"We are working together so that we can help those less fortunate than us. We like to believe that every Jew is comfortable, but the facts speak for themselves. The rabbis urge people to be among the givers — or the takers, if need be. Do not stand idle.

"Although Jews help out all year round, we have a special campaign before Passover, because on Passover there is a requirement that all Jews rejoice. When someone is celebrating but knows there is a Jew in need, the law says that he cannot be happy. There is a special obligation for us during Passover to help alleviate someone else's stress."

Source of pride

It is a special source of pride that students have gotten involved in the campaign, said Rabbi Witty. "School students are big partners in the drive. It is great that they are participating and can see for themselves where their mitzvah is going."

He praised NCJW, Toronto Section, without whom, he said, "none of this would be happening. It is amazing to see the concern lavished on this project. It is a marvelous reflection that we do live in a caring community."

Charlene Arjo, who co-chairs this year's campaign with Rebecca Ber and Bonnie Dale, said the campaign is important from a community standpoint because it involves everyone and teaches through action and participation, the importance of tzedakah.

Kosher for Passover food donations will be accepted at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St. until March 31. Volunteer drivers are needed to deliver boxes, and those who can help out are asked to arrive at Council House on March 31 at 9 a.m.

YESHA urges leadership to question Israel's policies

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While the Canadian Friends of YESHA say they aren't specifically out to upset the Jewish establishment's apple cart, they are bent on asking hard questions, and prodding Canadian Jewry to do the same.

In short, says the organization that gives moral and financial support to the 152,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, it's time this country's Jewish leadership started openly questioning Israel's Labor government, and how it is pursuing peace.

The group, once considered an apologist for the most militant right-wing settlers but which now claims a growing membership, decries what it calls "blanket" statements from national Jewish organizations supporting the Olso peace accords, and argues it is unrealistic, especially after the recent spate of Hamas bomb attacks, to expect the entire community to fall into line behind Prime Minister Shimon Peres.

"It can no longer be business as usual," states the Friends' co-chair, Laurence Zeifman. "How many more people [in Israel] have to die? At what point does the community say we have to address the issues?"

Zeifman concedes there is much "healthy" diversity in opinion among Canadian Jews when it comes to Israel and the peace process, and that the level of debate has been largely civil. It's Jewish officialdom he and his group have a problem with.

"There is a blatant position within the community leadership to support [Israel's] government. The uniformity is too much. At some point, that policy has to be questioned.

"Just as B'nai Brith can't be allowed to become the Likud party's headquarters in Canada, we can't allow Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jewish Federations or The Canadian Jewish News for that matter, to become Labor headquarters in Canada," Zeifman said.

Recently, the Friends came in for criticism for mailing letters to Jewish leaders and rabbis, suggesting support for the peace process be questioned in light of recent Hamas suicide bombings and statements by top Palestinian officials.

The letters were said to have angered many for their allusion to North American Jewry's silence during the Holocaust, implying the same kind of silence exists today when it comes to Israel's peace policies.

So offended was Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, that he asked the authors to withdraw the letter.

"It never should have been sent," Ronen told The CJN. "I assume it was sent in an isolated, momentary loss of thoughtfulness."

He said he was "extremely offended" at the way in which the Holocaust "was misused and abused" in the letter.

After he made his views known to the authors, the Friends sent out a clarification. "I wasn't entirely pleased with it but I have no desire to pursue the matter," Ronen said.

The Friends refused to provide The CJN with a copy of the letter and the clarification, saying they were "private correspondence."

But Zeifman does not apologize for the mailing's reference to the Holocaust, saying Jewish leadership's "silence" — then and now — is "extremely unfortunate.

"If Jewish leadership has not learned from the Holocaust, then the fear of invoking Holocaust imagery has reached a new level. We live in the shadow of the Holocaust, and we have an obligation to learn from it. Jewish leadership has to react accordingly."

Zeifman is an officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, whose apolitical mandate is to support the democratically elected government of Israel.

"I don't disagree with Congress' position," he explains. "But at the same time, we should not be pretending all is well."

He accused The CJN and the community leadership of ignoring a Jan. 10 speech in Stockholm by Yasser Arafat, in which the Palestinian president was alleged to have told Arab diplomats that the PLO plans to eliminate Israel and make life "unbearable" for Jews. Arafat was also reported to have said he has "no use for Jews."

Toronto's support for YESHA — a Hebrew acronym for the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza — will be recognized at a gala dinner April 23 in New York, where this city's Jewish community will be paid tribute and local activist Sabina Citron will be a guest of honor.

Importance of positive changes stressed

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The capacity to modify oneself is so pervasive and so much a part of the human spirit that the possibility to do so must be presented to everyone, irrespective of their condition, genetic makeup, age or severity of their disability.

The trick is to make sure that the modification is in a positive direction.

This is the assertion of noted educator and psychologist Dr. Reuven Feuerstein, whose theories and techniques of thinking and learning are respected not only in Israel, where he lives, but around the world.

Feuerstein is the founder and director of the International Centre for the Enhancement of Learning Potential and the Hadassah-WIZO-Canada Research Institute in Jerusalem.

He established the institute in 1965. "Hadassah-WIZO Canada continues until now to be one of our most pivotal sources of support," he told The CJN in a recent interview.

Sporting his trademark black beret, Feuerstein was preparing to meet an excited student body at Toronto's Dr. Abraham Shore Academy/She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school that uses his methods extensively. He was in the city as part of a North American tour.

In the evening, he spoke to a crowd of nearly 600 at the Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda synagogue.

His belief in the potential of each human being has led him to work with, among others, people who have been considered by some to have little hope, such as those with Down's syndrome or fragile X (a chromosomal disorder which causes retardation).

And he has had some remarkable successes.

He has successfully trained a group of young adults with Down's syndrome and other genetic developmental disorders to become caregivers to the aged and handicapped, using a combination of his unique teaching methods and a residential program which enabled them to learn to socialize with people who were both unfamiliar and non-disabled.

Some of these students even went into the Israeli army as volunteers. "Two were named as best soldier of the year in their battalion," Feuerstein said proudly.

Dr. Reuven Feuerstein greets She'arim students [from left] Noam Wolff, Philip Abramson, Mordechai Soroka and Noah Tenenbaum.

The Romanian-born psychologist, who earned his PhD at the Sorbonne, explained that his institute has three major programs: assessment, instrumental enrichment and services.

IQ tests, he said, have no meaning, as "a low IQ, which deteriorates with age anyway, precludes intervention."

What you have to do, he says, is "to assess how modifiable [a person is], how to modify him or her, and how permanent the change will be."

He has developed the Learning Potential Assessment Device, an evaluation tool that is now used in many settings.

Instrumental enrichment is a series of carefully constructed exercises given by specially trained teachers. Each one is aimed at developing a specific cognitive skill, such as analytic perception, orientation in space and time, or classification.

The child is helped to "organize the world in situations that require a real effort to divide, classify, discriminate, abbreviate, generalize, and all other mental operations necessary to give new information."

Instrumental enrichment, he said, gives children lasting tools with which to deal with their environment.

It is essential, he went on, to create an environment in which the child not only has the opportunity to make changes in himself, but indeed must make those changes to reach his goals.

Many times, Feuerstein charged, those with disabilities are not challenged. They are put in situations "where everyone knows you, and doesn't ask you to do too much."

His methods are not used only with the learning disabled or developmentally delayed. They are also used, for instance, with what he called "gifted underachievers," such as the new Ethiopian immigrants to Israel, and even in hi-tech industries, with great success.

Jews have the obligation to continue the work of G-d in creation. And that, he mused, includes correcting what He has done.

Hezbollah, too

Not to be outdone in the warfare of fanaticism waged by Hamas, their paradise-seeking soul mates, Hezbollah, are also resorting to suicide-murder in their religious war against Jews.

Even as 30 world leaders -- including Shimon Peres, Bill Clinton, Jean Chrétien, King Hussein and Yasser Arafat -- were meeting in Sharm El-Sheikh to discuss ways of eliminating terrorism, an IDF officer, Golani company commander Capt. Salah Zeidan, 23, from the Druze village of Beit Jann, was killed when a Hezbollah suicide bomber threw himself at the convoy that Zeidan was leading in southern Lebanon only two kilometres from Metulla. The bomber may have targeted the IDF commander of the district who was also in the jeep with Zeidan. But he emerged from the attack unhurt.

Later that same day, a member of the South Lebanon Army (SLA) militia was also killed by a Hezbollah-detonated bomb. This second bomb reportedly exploded only moments after OC Northern Command, Maj. Gen. Amiram Levine, had been in the area.

As reported in Israel's media, Hezbollah has carried out 111 attacks against the IDF and the SLA militia since January. In the past 15 months, it has launched more than 700 such attacks in which 64 IDF and SLA soldiers have been killed and more than 200 have been wounded.

In keeping with its long-standing policy of measured retaliation against the perpetrators of such acts, Israel cannot and will not allow Hezbollah to go unpunished.

Part of Israel's response however must take into account Syria's role in allowing Hezbollah to conduct the attacks. It was surely no coincidence that Zeidan was killed on the day of the Sharm El-Sheikh talks which Syrian President Hafez al-Assad chose not to attend. But Assad's manipulations and ploys are a fool's game. He merely invites more loss of life in the area and pushes further away the people whose trust he will need when he seeks, eventually, to find a partner in negotiating peace.

Government's void

On Nov. 1, 1988, Konrads Kalejs was deported by the United States to Australia. The American government decision "was based on Kalejs' service and activities as a senior officer in a Nazi execution squad which murdered unarmed civilians in Latvia during World War II, and his misrepresentation of that service and those activities when he entered the Unites States."

But Kalejs didn't make it to Australia. Instead, he now resides in a suburb of Toronto. He has been in Canada for more than two years, entering and leaving virtually at will. He is awaiting a deportation hearing which has been adjourned a number of times. His next court appearance is scheduled for May.

Apparently, the government is not offended that such a man has found a haven in Canada. Thankfully, however, many of the residents in the condominium where Kalejs lives are.

Stepping assertively into the void created by the federal government's inaction, about 55 people recently gathered, as reported in last week's issue of The CJN, "to express their revulsion at having Kalejs...living in their building...Their anger and frustration were palpable." We commend everyone who took part in the demonstration against Kalejs. But we wish to especially commend the initiative and the determination of its organizer Rhonda Pasternack. She decided to organize the meeting "to convey to public officials the displeasure and frustration of her fellow residents at having an accused war criminal in their midst."

Faced with such unacceptable behavior from Ottawa, we are heartened by the example of individual citizens acting within the law to send so forceful a message to both Kalejs and the government.

When will the attorney general act?

The decision on March 15 by the Ontario Attorney General's Office to drop charges filed on Nov. 8, 1995, against Nazi hate propagandist Ernst Zundel is not only misguided, but ill conceived. The claim by the Crown of "insufficient evidence" is outrageous.

Considering the position taken by the Progressive Conservative party during last year's election campaign and Charles Harnick's previous statement in the Ontario legislature, we fully intend to hold Harnick and the Ontario government to their words and their campaign platform.

Quoting some of Zundel's propaganda, Harnick urged the then attorney general Marion Boyd "to stop this man."

For example, Harnick referred to the following statements by Zundel: "One day, in the not too distant future, the tables might well be turned and the aroused gentile world will meet out Justice and Vengeance." And "Once cleansed from the stigma of having been tainted by 'Nazi-Holocaust' lies and propaganda, we can use the eminently successful policies of Hitler."

Harnick then asked the attorney general: "Minister, I am offended by those statements ... I am equally offended by your government's inaction. Do these statements not constitute that wilful promotion of hatred against an identifiable group as defined in the Criminal Code? ... Minister, you have it in your power to stop this man. When will you do it?"

Indeed, now that Harnick is the attorney general, the question still remains: It is in your power, Minister, to stop this man. When will you do it?

Looking for "real common sense"

In Lorrie Goldstein's response ("In Defence of 'Common Sense,' " — CJN, March 7) to Rabbi Dow Marmur's earlier article, he fails to address three basic questions. First, why was the Harris government so eager, within weeks of taking office, to implement severe welfare cuts before any other measures were taken? Since welfare recipients were the ones selected to bear the brunt of the attack on the deficit, surely a much more humane approach could have been taken — phasing in the cuts or going after those who are defrauding the system.

Secondly, why is giving a tax break to taxpayers going to help the economy? Surely, money that goes to welfare recipients would do the same.

Finally, why is it acceptable for the government to borrow billions of dollars to shore up revenues when the tax breaks take effect, but it is not acceptable to borrow to help the poor?

Goldstein's arguments deliberately avoid some basic questions. If only "real common sense" prevailed, we wouldn't be living in such a polarized society.

Displeased with the CJC

The Canadian Jewish Congress' acceptance of Judge Bienvenue's lukewarm apology for his remarks about women and thoughtless words about Holocaust victims dying painlessly, infuriated me, a Holocaust survivor.

I strongly disagree with the Congress decision because it lacked the chastisement due the judge, who now faces judiciary proceedings by his peers.

It seems to me that Congress appeased the judge rather than voice its strong disapproval of his remarks and his behavior in court.

Protests rabbi being barred from Israel

Naif Hawmatmah, the architect of the infamous Ma'alot massacre (where 22 innocent Jewish children were cold-bloodedly murdered), is being allowed back into Israel. At the same time, Shimon Peres' left-wing government prohibits a well-known rabbi in New York City from entering Israel because he made (foolishly) strong negative comments about Yitzhak Rabin and his Labor government. This rabbi and his congregation supported and aided the state of Israel for the past 50 years. He strongly criticized the Oslo agreement, but since he unwisely used the freedom of free speech, he is barred from entering the Jewish homeland.

Where are our great liberals?

Where are all the guardians of human rights?

Where are all those who want Israel to be a democratic country?

Why are they all so deafeningly silent?

The trial of the century - Nuremburg

By ISRAEL KOPYTO

In November 1945 — just five months after the total collapse of Hitler's Third Reich — one of the most famous trials in history began, when 21 of Nazi Germany's war criminals were indicted in Nuremberg before the International Military Tribunal of the victorious Allied Forces.

In the ancient city of Nuremberg, with its Palace of Justice in the centre of the town, thousands of people gathered from all parts of the world to witness the end of the 12-year-old Nazi regime in Germany.

We came from New Ulm, Bavaria, a delegation of five representing the displaced persons' camp inmates, having been provided with special entry passes by the Munich Central District of Jews in Germany.

Arriving at the main railway station of Nuremberg we could see thousands of people streaming towards the Furtstrasse, where the Hall of Justice was located.

The closer we came to the centre of the city, the more evident was the extent of the devastation wrought on this former stronghold, which was intended to be an eternal symbol of the 1,000-year Reich ushered in by Adolph Hitler.

We continued on our way, mingling with the huge throngs making their way down the thoroughfares cordoned off by American security and military police. Hundreds of newspaper reporters, movie photographers and television crews moved with the crowd.

After the formalities of having our papers checked at the entrance gate, we entered the awesome Hall of Justice.

The Nuremberg Trial was officially opened on Nov. 20, 1945, and continued until Aug. 31, 1946. The verdicts were handed down on Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 — a reminder to all of the civilized world that the day of reckoning had arrived for the inhuman Nazis and the heinous crimes committed under their rule.

For the German people, the trials conducted by the International Tribunal were a warning that the nations who had suffered under the Nazi occupation were determined never again to allow such mass murder to occur at the hands of German militarism.

At the opening of the trial, the court room is crowded with thousands of spectators who have come from many different countries of the world, the majority from the former Nazi-occupied countries of Europe.

Precisely at 10 a.m. the proceedings begin. Presiding over the court is Lord Justice Lawrence of Great Britain. He pronounces the names of the Nazi organizations on trial, as well as the names of the defendants charged with crimes against humanity including Hermann Goering, Joachim von Ribbentrop, Julius Streicher and others.

An air of hushed suspense hangs over the court as the president announces the entry of the accused. Through a side door, the 21 gauleiters are led into the courtroom, heavily guarded by the American military police. Here they come, yesterday's "heroes" of the 1,000-year regime. One by one they take their seats on the prisoners' bench, their heads lowered, some with shaven heads and some in military uniforms stripped of their former medals and the iron crosses which only a few months earlier had marked them as leaders of the "master race."

Shamed and humiliated, they sit in front of the audience filling the vast hall; in front of some 300 newspaper reporters from all over the world; in front of the representatives of the international diplomatic corps and high-ranking military officers of the Allied countries; before the thousands who stand outside on the streets surrounding the courtroom and before the entire world and human history.

The president asks each one of the accused whether he pleads guilty to the crimes with which he is charged. The answer of each is "Not guilty."

The court adjourns for recess.

Every time a recess was announced, there was a mad rush from the courtroom to the press chamber, as correspondents were anxious to be first with their news dispatches to the world, to describe the macabre panorama unfolding in the Nuremberg Hall of Justice where the Great Crime of the German People against humanity was on trial.

For eight long months, the trials continued, the court sitting five days a week, hearing the testimony of hundreds of witnesses from all strata of the population of formerly occupied Europe.

Trucks arrived every day bringing packing cases filled with documents captured by the Allied armies from German military headquarters, from government buildings and thick-walled archive deposits, documents carefully collected and stored in anticipation of the final Nazi victory.

The format of the judicial proceedings was explained in a series of brochures distributed to the spectators in the courtroom. The first hearings would deal with the plan that systematically prepared Nazi Germany for aggressive war, beginning with the annexation of Sudentenland from Czechoslovakia, ending with the attack against Poland on Sept. 1, 1939.

Then further hearings would deal with the war crimes perpetrated by the Nazis in the countries of Europe under their subjugation.

All 21 defendants declared themselves not guilty of the charges against them. All of them claimed to have had no knowledge of what was going on in their ministry. They knew nothing of war crimes, of death camps, of the massacre of men, women and children or of millions of war prisoners.

Goering, for example, the founder of the Gestapo, had no knowledge of any program devised by the Nazis to annihilate all the Jews in the German-occupied countries. Hans Frank, the governor general of Poland, who had his headquarters in Krakow, who received direct orders from Berlin to liquidate the Jews of Poland, under whose command plans were made for the liquidation of Poles after the Judenrein operation was completed, who personally issued instructions for the prompt execution of orders — this same gauleiter, Hans Frank, declared before the tribunal that he had never heard of such "labor" camps as Auschwitz, Treblinka, Maidanek, Sobibor, Belzec or hundreds of other death camps.

One after the other — Streicher, Alfred Rosenberg, Ernst Kaltenbrunner and the rest of the procession of defendants — knew nothing and saw nothing and heard nothing of the crimes which poured forth from the testimony of hundreds of witnesses and wagon-loads of documents. They had never heard that of the 9½ million Jews in Europe barely 3½ million remained, saved through some miracle, uprooted, orphaned, bereft of wives, husbands and children — all a result of the well-planned German death machine.

They were ignorant of the fact that hardly a Jewish child remained in all of formerly-occupied Europe. They had not heard of a Janusz Korczak who, with more than 200 Jewish children whom he had taken under his care, was herded into the gas chambers of Treblinka. They knew nothing of the crimes committed in every country that fell under the bloody heel of the Nazis. They were innocent, untainted by the destruction of thousands of towns and villages and millions of human lives in all of the countries of Europe where the Nazi armies had set foot.

They found utterly unbelievable the testimony which revealed the staggering figure of nearly 35 million lives destroyed. All of this was something unknown to the accused.

In his opening speech, the chief prosecutor of the United States, Justice Robert H. Jackson, declared:

"These men know nothing of the evil prepetrated in the German-occupied regions. They [the defendants] who are responsible not only for the deaths of millions of innocent men, women and children, but also for the loss of countless future generations — they still speak with great admiration of Nazi Germany and Hitlerism. What a pity that besides the testimony already seen and heard here, there could not be present the millions of men, women and children who perished. If only they could have been brought to the witness stand, just think how many more 'wonders' could be told about the 12-year-old Nazi regime in Germany!

The verdict of the Nuremberg Tribunal was made public on Oct. 1, 1946. In accordance with international law, the Nuremberg Military Tribunal of the Allied countries pronounced the following sentences:

Sentenced to death by hanging: Hermann Wilhelm Goering, Joachim von Ribbentrop, Wilhelm Keitel, Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Alfred Rosenberg, Hans Frank, Wilhelm Frick, Julius Streicher, Fritz Sauckel, Arthur Seyss-Inquart, Alfred Jodl, Martin Bormann.

All sentences were carried out on Oct. 16 of the same year, with the exception of two. Goering had committed suicide a day before the executions and Bormann, who was sentenced in absentia, had been fortunate enough not to have received an "invitation" to "our gathering," as the president of the court remarked with irony.

Sentenced to lifelong imprisonment: Rudolph Hess, Walter Funk, Erich Raeder.

Balder von Shirach and Albert Speer received 20-year prison terms; Constatin von Neurath — 10 years in prison. Hjamlar Schacht, Frans von Papen and Hans Fritsche were freed (over strong protest from the Soviet prosecutor, Roman Rudenko).

The following Nazi organizations were found guilty simultaneously of crimes against humanity: The Leadership Corps of the Nazi Party, whose gauleiters participated directly in crimes against humanity, the Gestapo — Secret State Police; the SD — Security service; the SS — Elite corps; the SA — Storm troops; the High Command of the German armed forces.

Such was the inglorious end of the Third Reich as pronounced by the Nuremberg International Tribunal — the end of a regime that was to endure for a "glorious" millenium.

Opinions

On politics and polls

By Shira Herzog

Two months before the election, much is unclear in Israel. To the extent that terrorist attacks harden the positions of undecided voters, the cynical observer may be right in saying that Hamas will determine the results of the election. But the reality is far more complex, especially since in this election, Israelis will exercise a choice they never had before.

On May 29, every Israeli voter will be asked to cast two ballots: one for a direct election for the position of prime minister, and the second for a party list for the Knesset. Because of this, the election campaign itself is different from any in the past. Each of the two candidates for the prime ministerial post, Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu, has his own campaign team and advisors, while his party is running a separate campaign. And each realizes that even if he wins the position, his party may not have a plurality of seats in the Knesset.

In the new system, the prime minister may be able to form a majority coalition even if his party comes in second, especially because of the decision likely to be made by two of the new parties running in this election.

It already seems that in the Knesset race, the right-wing bloc will gain a few more seats than the left-wing bloc. But two of the centrist parties running for the first time — Natan Sharansky's Russian party and Avigdor Kehalani's Third Way — are likely to back either winner in the prime ministerial vote for reasons of their own political survival. Because the spread between the two major blocs will probably be small, Kehalani and Sharansky's combined seven to nine seats could guarantee a coalition for either candidate. The winner is virtually guaranteed a majority (even if slim), because these two new centre parties will hold the balance of power. This also means that an American-style gridlock between the executive and legislative branches is improbable. Therefore, the important question is not whether Likud or Labor gains more seats with its traditional coalition partners, but rather who will win the prime ministerial race.

In that competition, recent events on the right have changed the configuration. Netanyahu was concerned about plans by Raphael Eitan and David Levy — the leaders of two small parties — to run in the prime ministerial election. This might have split the right-wing vote, thereby necessitating a run-off in a second round. Netanyahu wanted to prevent this, in case ultra-Orthodox voters on the right would abstain a second time, once their vote for their Knesset party had already been cast, thereby weakening his chances against Peres in the second round. This was one of the central motivations that led him to sign generous political deals with Eitan and Levy, merging their lists with Likud's, and guaranteeing them second and third place on the Likud list. While criticized by many in his own party for weakening their own positions on the list as a result of the merger, Netanyahu effectively ensured only one round in the competition wth Peres.

The race between Peres and Netanyahu, in turn, will be extremely close, and for Canadians, reminiscent of the recent Quebec referendum, the result will likely be 51 to 49 percent, or close to it. One hundred thousand to 120,000 voters will determine the winner — and these swing votes might even come from the committed ranks of Likud or Labor. Israeli voters will be able to split their vote for the first time. As a result, for example, voters who believe that Peres is the stronger candidate of the two, but who have reservations about his policies, may give Peres their prime ministerial vote, and Likud their Knesset vote.

The close nature of the race had led Peres and Netanyahu to aggressively woo the ultra-Orthodox bloc of 100,000 disciplined voters. A nod from this community's rabbinic leaders for a preferred candidate will bring out their followers in droves. Although questions have been raised about his commitment to religious values, Netanyahu hopes to gain their vote. Peres' strategy is different. Because of the bloc's historic enmity to the Labor party, he hopes to gain just enough support to result in an en masse abstention in the prime ministerial vote by the ultra-Orthodox voters.

And so the campaign continues, fuelled by an endless string of polls and punditry. Israelis are playing along with the polling game, as evidenced in the spreads of eight to nine percent in different pollsters' readings. In fact, when asked about their intentions, Israeli voters are more likely to express their present feelings about the incumbent or his opponent, rather than an accurate reflection of how they will vote on May 29. In a close race, pollsters beware ...

Hate material found on the Internet

By Morton Weinfeld

As Jews prepare to celebrate Passover, it is timely to ponder new forms of anti-Semitism facing North American Jews today. While these are not the worst of times, it is too early to shut down Jewish antennae.

Recent decisions by the Immigration and Refugee Board represent a more common and complex form of anti-Semitism — that which may be a product of government policy. One decision, confirmed by the courts, suggests that Jewish refugee claimants could be denied status in Canada because they always have a safe haven in Israel. Another series of decisions has led in recent years to granting of refugee status to many former Soviet "Jews" claiming religious persecution in Israel.

Both sets of decisions are abominable and cause harm to Jews and Jewish sensibilities. It is unlikely, and certainly hard to prove, that these decisions are motivated in all cases by anti-Semitism. But that is irrelevant. The outcomes of policies are ultimately more important than the motivations for them.

Perhaps the most worrisome development has been the explanation of anti-Semitism and hate on the Internet, or cyberhate. Jewish communal organizations have begun to sound the alarm. It is technologically difficult, if not impossible, to control the proliferation of web sites. And there is a reluctance in some quarters, such as among Internet enthusiasts and academics, to move to censorship as a solution.

McGill University's Hillel has set up an anti-racism web page site, which refutes the arguments of the hatemongers. Its organizer, David Abitbol, argues that the best way to combat Holocaust deniers and other Internet anti-Semitism and racism is to "let everybody's ideas sink or swim in the marketplace of ideas."

But there is a risk here. I am indebted to Reuben Brasloff for reminding me that in the Middle Ages, Jews engaged in public disputations with Christian theologians and often lost, as the deck was stacked against them. Today, the deck is more evenly stacked — Jews are no longer powerless supplicants — but the stakes are still high.

Libertarians believe that the best antidote to offensive speech is more speech. But there are no guarantees and no absolute rights. One of the major dangers is that impressionable teenagers will be exposed to hate, without similar exposure to counter-arguments. A teenager surfing the Net may summon up a neo-Nazi reference on the Holocaust without knowing its true source. But in libraries, books on creation science or para-psychology are not classified with the same call numbers as books on evolution or neuro-science.

I do not know if there is any scientific evidence about the numbers of young people who have been clearly swayed by Net hate to join racist groups or accept racist beliefs. But if it could be shown that such numbers are growing, I would support more aggressive regulation.

Like the disputations of earlier centuries against Church officials, it is the anti-Semites who by and large initiate the "debate" and define its terms. Jews adopt a reactive posture:

The Holocaust is a hoax.
No it is not.
Jews control banks and the media.
No they do not.

But our society forbids the sale of cigarettes and alcohol or rental of porn videos to minors. Porn magazines are placed high on magazine racks, for similar reasons. Television is about to enter the age of the v-chip, which is designed to give parents control over the violence to which their children will be exposed.

Some experts, including the Canadian Information Highway Advisory Council and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in the United States, reportedly favor a voluntary code of ethics for Internet providers. It is hoped that these providers would decline to carry hate messages after public complaints.

That may not be sufficient, if evidence demonstrates increasing recruitment to racist movements via the Net. Some way must be found to achieve a tighter degree of regulation, particularly regarding access by minors. Criminal prosecutions could be explored as well.

Whatever happened to Ethiopian Jews?

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Only 12 years ago, and then again in 1991, Ethiopian Jews were headline material. Daring rescue operations from Israel elicited the admiration of the whole world, and the support organizations urged even greater attention to their needs. They called our attention to the fact that there were thousands of the rescued brothers and sisters still waiting for liberty and security.

Thereafter we heard little about them — until two months ago, when the media erupted with pictures of 10,000 Ethiopian demonstrators in Israel. "Our blood is as good as anybody's!" was their battle cry. The demonstration showed how deep the humiliation of Ethiopian Jews had become, and the blood scandal was the last straw. Health authorities had routinely discarded donations from Ethiopians serving in the Israeli army, for it was believed that their blood represents a higher risk of AIDS infection.

Instead of individual examination of each donation, it was easier to stereotype one segment of the population and surreptitiously discard their blood, thereby making Ethiopian Jews unwittingly into an undesirable portion of the population.

Also, lately some young Ethiopian recruits in the army have committed suicide at a rate far greater than in any other group of the population.

The result of a recent investigation showed that the same problems which affect many blacks in North America have infiltrated Israeli society as well, Ethiopian children are (with some notable exceptions) in the least progressive and demanding schools; many of them are uprooted from their families and live in boarding schools; and their reading skills at the fifth grade level are far below the average of other children. Ethiopian children are often automatically channelled into non-academic streams, and an uncomfortably high percentage of them have become dropouts and have drifted into alcohol and drug abuse, have committed petty crimes and have joined violent gangs — though only a little while ago delinquency was totally unheard of amongst Ethiopian teenagers.

The public, when it is not occupied with terrorism and the peace process, has suddenly become aware of an urgent problem in its midst. Only seven percent of Ethiopian 12th graders receive a matriculation certificate, the lowest of any ethnic group in the country, while Israeli Arabs graduate 14 percent and Israeli Jews in general, 40 percent. The top matriculates come from the recent Soviet immigration and from the middle and upper middle classes in the country.

Israelis are known for their capacity to take action when action is needed. Their conscience has been aroused and there is every likelihood that the issue will at least be confronted.

Nazi-era films conveyed subliminal messages

By Sheldon Kirshner

Movies were an integral component of Nazi Germany's propaganda machinery. Together with newspapers, magazines and radio, film was a means by which to mobilize emotions and immobilize minds.

Josef Goebbels, the minister of propaganda, was fully aware of this. Accordingly, his ministry brought the Jewish-purged medium under its control, vetting movie scripts, monitoring productions and supervizing publicity.

Given the Nazis' priorities, the Third Reich was a golden era of filmmaking in Germany. More than 1,000 films were produced during that 12-year period. By comparison, the film scene in post-war Germany is positively insignificant.

It may be surprising, but the vast majority of German films from 1933 to 1945 were non-political and reflected little of everyday realities. Ranging from solemn dramas to frothy comedies, they were invariably bereft of pet Nazi themes. Some, however, were shot through with subliminal messages designed to shape public opinion.

There were, of course, films which deviated from the norm. Leni Riefenstahl's Triumph of the Will, a masterpiece of manipulation, celebrated the 1934 Nazi party congress in Nuremberg. Veit Harlan's Jew Suss and Fritz Hippler's The Eternal Jew were overtly anti-Semitic and pandered to base instincts.

These classics of anti-Jewish agitation were not on the program of The Ministry of Illusion, a recent series in Toronto showcasing mainstream films of the Nazi epoch. The event, curated by University of California scholar Eric Rentschler, was sponsored by Cinematheque Ontario and the Goethe Institute.

The films I saw, four in number, were La Habanera (1937), The Broken Jug (1937), The Emperor of California (1936) and Great Freedom No. 7 (1944).

La Habanera, set in Puerto Rico, is directed by Detlef Sierck, who went on to fashion a career in Hollywood as Douglas Sirk. La Habanera portrays a Swedish woman's affair with, and disastrous marriage to, a Puerto Rican landowner.

Resounding to the rhythmic beat of Latin music and brimming with scenes of local color, La Habanera is first and foremost a melodramatic confection of love gone wrong, homesickness and corruption in high places. The film, shot in black and white, is condescending toward Caribbean Hispanic culture and dreamily positive about wintry Nordic landscapes. It conveys the homily that there is no place like home.

Zarah Leander, the highest paid actress of the day in Germany, plays Astree, the smitten maiden who falls into the clutches of Don Pedro de Avila (Ferdinand Marian), a shifty, swarthy Don Juan whose greed and treachery know no bounds.

Leander, a Swede who returned to Stockholm during World War II, imparts Aryan beauty, guilelessness and innocence. Astree's ethnocentric aunt (Julia Serda), her chaperon in Puerto Rico, is contemptuous of the brown-skinned natives. In this respect, she mirrors racist Nazi attitudes.

The Broken Jug, supposedly Adolf Hitler's favorite film, is based on a play by Heinrich von Kleist. The plot turns on a physically slack, mentally lazy judge (Emil Jannings) whose incompetence is finally exposed by an upright court inspector.

The film, which seems to be set in the 18th century, tries to show how the pursuit of private pleasures by a lax civil servant can undermine the integrity of a society.

A vehicle for Jannings, who left Hollywood with the advent of sound, The Brown Jug is didactic, occasionally shrill and none too pleasing from an esthetic point of view.

A Nazi Western? Look no further than The Emperor of California, which teems with English-speaking Indians and cowboys who express themselves in excellent German. Officially deemed as "politically and artistically ... worthwhile," it unfolds against the backdrop of scenic desert country and a thundering musical score.

Directed by and starring Luis Trenker, the film follows the fortunes of fur trader-cum-entrepreneur August Suter in mid-19th century California. Forced to leave his family in Germany, Suter befriends Indians and fights off rogues as he makes his way to the Pacific coast via inhospitable mountain ranges and searing deserts.

At last, after a death-defying experience in the sand dunes of Arizona, he reaches the promised land. He establishes a thriving and idyllic agrarian colony there. But to his despair, it is pushed to the brink of destruction by the avarice of gold rush miners.

Filled with raucous adventurers, and impregnated with a sense of manifest destiny, The Emperor of California is held together by a credible script, solid production values and passable performances. As entertainment, it handily fulfils its mandate.

The Emperor of California*, a Nazi Western.

But dig deeper and a motherlode of none-too-subtle messages pop up. The first and most important is that an individual can and should serve one's nation. The second, which is far more insidious, glorifies the Nazi idea of lebensraum (living space), which prompted Germany's 1941 invasion of the Soviet Union.

Great Freedom No. 7, starring the heartthrob of German film, Hans Albers, stands in sharp juxtaposition to The Emperor of California.

A highly conventional, contemporary romance filmed in color, it takes place in a seedy nightclub in St. Pauli, Hamburg's redlight district. The protagonists are Hannes (Albers), an aging sailor who moonlights as a crooner, and Gisela (Ilse Werner), a young damsel who comes under his soothing influence.

Containing not a shred of propagandistic material, Great Freedom No. 7 is pure escapist fare, meant to divert attention away from the war, which was going badly for Germany in 1944.

Interestingly enough, Goebbels so disliked the film that he banned it. Apparently, he was dismayed that the male characters were faint-hearted rather than rugged specimens of German manhood.

In any case, Great Freedom No. 7 is an eminently forgettable film. Not even Albers, the blond and blue-eyed stoic hero, can redeem it from the swamp of artistic mediocrity.

Helping the hungry

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

The Torah portion Tzav deals with the details of the ancient sacrificial system. This year it coincides with Shabbat Hagadol, the great Sabbath prior to Passover, a pilgrimage festival when Jews came from throughout the land of Israel to bring offerings in the Temple in Jerusalem.

In the Torah reading, Aaron and his sons are instructed to maintain a perpetual fire on the altar. The flame had to burn continually, requiring frequent stoking and daily renewal. In apparent contrast, Pesach was a holy time with much special activity and excitement.

We are tempted to see two patterns in distinction to one another: the daily and the once-a-year, the regular and the spontaneous, the plain and the majestic. Yet the two are interdependent. The daily commitment needs the special moments to re-ignite the fire; the pyrotechnics of Passover need to be sustained or they will be forgotten.

Thus our ongoing effort to care for the hungry receives a boost at this time of year. During the seder we shall recite: "Let all who are hungry come to eat." Should that not be our daily commitment as well? Perhaps this Passover the words we recite will take on a new tone and inspire us to struggle against hunger throughout the year.

Locally, Jewish organizations have developed programs to alleviate hunger and break the cycle of poverty. They operate out of a prophetic mandate to care for the weak and oppressed. They arise from the prophetic criticism that sacrifice without ethics is barren and blasphemous.

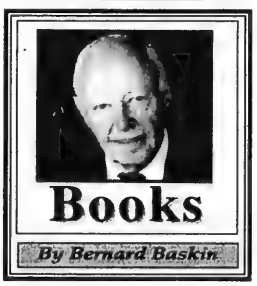
Local communities collect food and donations for ma'ot chittin (wheat money) to sustain those Jewish families for whom the financial burdens of providing kosher for Passover food is onerous.

Hunger is not only physical. There is a spiritual hunger which you can alleviate. Local communities arrange for volunteers to open their homes to new immigrants from the former Soviet Union for a Pesach seder. "Let my people know" has now replaced "Let my people go." We must educate those whose exodus to freedom depended on our efforts. Contact your synagogue or local federation offices.

Mazon: A Jewish Response to Hunger seeks to avert the tragedy of poverty by asking us to invite a hungry person to a seder with us. If that person is not physically present, we can simply donate the amount of money we would have spent on our home meal to Mazon. They will enable you to share your Passover meal with the poor. Send your contributions to Mazon Canada, 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 206, Toronto, Ont. M6B 3K1.

In all these cases, we must realize that our efforts will not, by themselves, solve the problem of hunger or lack of Jewish knowledge. But that should not block us from contributing something towards the struggle. Our Sages teach: "The work is not yours to complete, but you are not without obligation." As we read about sacrifices of old, let us consider making some today. This year some are enslaved. Next year may all of us be free.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is the senior rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.



All Rivers Run Into The Sea by Elie Weisel, Random House $36

Elie Weisel, a brand plucked from the fire, has interpreted his survival from Nazi horror as imposing upon him at least three obligations: first, to tell the brutal and harrowing story of the dead and to plead for a measure of understanding as to how they perished; second, to dissect and try to comprehend the human and divine madness behind the Holocaust; third, to warn a quickly forgetting humanity about the infectiousness of evil and to suggest that there is a direct line from the ovens of Auschwitz to the devastation of Hiroshima, to the blood-letting in Vietnam, to the ethnic cleansing in the former Yugoslavia.

Although he has suggested that the proper response to the Holocaust is silence, Weisel has never lost faith in the power of the written word. In a recent interview he stated: "Jews have never believed in statues, we have never believed in buildings. The only way for us to communicate what happened in the past is through words, whether of past glory or of past disasters. Only words."

And intoxicated with words, he has written over 30 books and become an outspoken advocate for his people and the conscience of humankind. At 67, he is a world figure, recipient of the 1986 Nobel Peace Prize and a confidant of presidents and prime ministers. He has used his moral authority to publicize the plight of Soviet Jews, Cambodian refugees and African famine victims. It is no surprise that he was at President Bill Clinton's side when the decision was made to send U.S. troops to Bosnia.

He declares, "My priorities are Jewish priorities ... but they are not exclusive. Other people also suffer and we, as Jews, must do something for them as well."

All the Rivers Run into the Sea, is the first instalment of a two-part memoir that begins with the author's birth in 1929 in a shtetl on the border between Hungary and Romania, and concludes in the late 1960s with his marriage in New York.

The author's early history is well known from Night, the depiction of his harrowing experience as a teenager in Auschwitz and Buchenwald, and from his other books. He emerged from the Nazi cauldron of suffering a mute spirit, without a homeland and with the deaths of his parents and sister as a bitter legacy.

At the war's end, in a French orphanage, he faced a new language and culture. As a fledgling journalist he was buffeted by a welter of conflicting emotions; the need for love and affection, the quest for God, the meaning of Jewish identity, the reality of human depravity. There was a constant inward struggle between doubt and faith, despair and trust, forgetting and remembering.

In referring to this book, Weisel says, "I mean not to recount the story of my life, but my stories." And this volume is replete with vignettes, evaluations and anecdotes of extraordinary personalities: statesmen, writers, scholars and politicians. Prominent among them are Golda Meir, Gershom Scholem, I. B. Singer, Abraham J. Herschel and the Lubavitcher Rebbe.

The author tells this story: Martin Buber relates that he once addressed an audience of priests with these words, "What is the difference between Jews and Christians? We all await the Messiah. You believe he has already come and gone, while we do not. I therefore propose that we await him together. And when he appears we can ask him: 'Were you here before?' " Then he paused and added, "And I hope that at that moment, I will be close enough to whisper in his ear 'For the love of heaven, don't answer.' "

Singer, reveals the author, was extremely unpopular with his colleagues. They resented his bizarre subject matter and were jealous of his popularity. "His funeral was pathetic. There were few mourners. A rabbi delivered a eulogy in English with a phrase or two of Yiddish thrown in. Though I was not among his admirers, I felt sad. It should have been different."

Jewish Life

The Internet has given Passover an extra byte

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

How is this year's Passover different from all other Passovers?

Thanks to the amazing growth of information on the Internet, you can find commentaries on the Haggadah, look up a spicy new recipe or learn a new tune to impress them at the seder...all from a few strokes of your computer keyboard.

So if you can spare a moment from your shopping, cooking and cleaning, here are some Pesach sites on the Jewish Highway you might find of interest.

For a general overview of the history, preparation and the seder itself take a look at [http://members.aol.com/jewfaq/holidaya.htm].

If you want more of an analysis, you can find one at [http://www.jer1.co.il/orgs/ohr/special/pesach/pesax.htm]. For a brief but colorful overview of the holiday, go to [http://www.ort.org/ort/museum/passover.htm] where the story of the holiday is told in brief using beautiful images from 15th and 16th century Haggadot.

Freedom is certainly the central theme of Passover. Rabbi Shmuel Boteach analyzes two aspects of that theme in "Freedom of Body and Mind." [gopher://israel.nysernet.org:71/00/lists/oxford-judaism/freedom].

Chabad-Lubavitch provides a comprehensive look at all the rituals at [gopher://gopher.chabad.org:70/11/texts/hagada.exp] including a full English text of the Haggadah (according to Lubavitch custom).

I couldn't find any other Haggadot on the Internet but there certainly are people on-line willing to sell you some. Judaism.com carries a full line at [http://www.nauticom.net/users/judaica/holiday/haggadah1.html].

There are certain features of the seder that can easily be taken for granted or written off as gimmicks included to keep kids awake.

Eliezer Segal takes a deeper historical look at some of these, including "The Invisible Guest," "That Remarkable Kid" at [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/Calendar_Index.html#Passover].

Then, to show us how there really is nothing new under the sun, Segal takes us back in time a few thousand years to ancient Egypt.

In a tongue-in-cheek letter-to-the-editor, Segal, or should I say "Ihknat-Ra XIII," voices his displeasure over media coverage of the escape of the Israelites from Egypt. [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/880429_Exodus_Satire.html]

People searching for a non-traditional Passover may be interested in "The Seder of Rebirth" [gopher://israel.nysernet.org:70/00/renewal/waskow/sedertik].

Phyllis Berman and Arthur Waskow have created a new seder that draws a parallel between the liberation and birth of a people in the Passover story and the contemporary liberation of women. If you are partial to the traditional Haggadah, this definitely will not be your cup of wine.

Speaking of which, all those people who still think kosher wine must mean a thick, syrupy drink should take a look at "Wines in Israel" [http://www.agmonet.co.il/wines/menu.htm]. You can browse through eight of Israel's wineries from giant Carmel Mizrachi (maker of the famous Kosher Sacramental) to the Margalit Winery whose Cabernet Sauvignon '91 is described as "a composed, refined wine, with excellent ageing potential and a pleasant, oaky, buttery bouquet."

Music, food and fun

Is it time to refresh the music around your seder table? If you're looking for Haggadah melodies, check out [http://www.613.org/passover.html] and listen to generous selections of the Haggadah on-line. The site uses the RealAudio technology [http://www2.realaudio.com/release/download.html] that we discussed in a previous column. You'll hear Cantor P. Rabinovicz sing all your favorites and some new versions too. The cantor uses the traditional Haggadah and sings in Hebrew only. (Sound quality will vary depending on the speed of your modem and computer.)

Kids will enjoy "Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah" [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Uncle_Eli/Eli.html] by Calgary's Eliezer Segal. This Haggadah tells the story of the seder through a series of delightful poems. And it's all delivered on a fresh, crisp matzah background!

Dr. Nurit Reshef of Edmonton has designed another fine site for kids called "Pesach Fun" [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/~yreshef/pesach.htm]. There, you'll find a holiday quiz, a Pesach story from Tunisia and a clickable seder plate which explains the reasons for its contents.

Both kids and adults will be fascinated by the way Ethiopian Jews celebrate Pesach. [http://www.cais.com/nacoej/17.html]. For example, "the ritual meal took place outdoors, by moonlight. The Jews sat on the ground, separated by age and gender. The sparse meal, of Ethiopian matzah and meat, was eaten rapidly, as if they were indeed fleeing from Egypt." In the accompanying photo, there is a shot of several member of the community sitting beside the 4,000 eggs for their seder in Addis Ababa.

The always entertaining folks at Virtual Jerusalem promise another delightful site for Passover [http://www.jer1.co.il/holidays/pesach/]. At this site, you can learn about Pesach and Haggadot from around the world, test your Pesach IQ and even search the site for the hidden Afikoman. (By the way, this page is decorated with the picture of a certain dough boy with a red slash through him surrounded by the phrase "Just Say No to Chometz.")

And speaking of food, Kosher Express, an on-line supplier of kosher for Passover food from Atlanta has compiled an impressive list of holiday recipes [http://www.marketnet.com/mktnet/kosher/recipes.html]. There, you can find recipes for such traditional fare as charoset (the walnut apple and wine mixture found on the seder plate) to the exotic Persian Fruit Salad, Mock Oatmeal Drop Cookies and Dairy Matzah Lasagna. (Don't miss the links to other Pesach recipe sites.)

If you're already fed up with the cooking and the cleaning and the shopping and want to make yourself feel even worse, then go to [http://www.intournet.co.il/kesher/index.html]. There you will find Kesher Tours and its "Pesach Plus" excursions to the Bahamas and Arizona where they promise to "tantalize your taste buds as you dine on three Glatt kosher meals prepared daily under the direction of our Master Chef."

All I can say to that is...

Dayenu!

[http://www.613.org/passover/hagada15.ram]

(And to hear Dayenu, don't forget you'll need RealAudio.)

[http://www2.realaudio.com/release/download.html]

Have a kosher and happy Pesach!

Auerbach's back in spin as world frisbee champ

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Manipulating a frisbee must be something like riding a bike — it's something you never forget.

How else to explain that Gary Auerbach could give up freestyle frisbee throwing for 10 years, resume practising for two weeks and then go on to become one-half of the 1995 Freestyle Players Association (FPA) world pairs champions.

Auerbach, 29, achieved the milestone last summer at the FPA event in Jacksonville Beach, Fla. His last freestyle competition before that was in 1985, after which "I took my frisbee and hung it on the wall."

In the intervening decade Auerbach travelled the world, studied dance, performed in a national ballet company, taught English, took up story-telling and enjoyed "Ultimate Frisbee" before getting back to freestyle performance.

A modern-age Renaissance Man, Auerbach has decided to make freestyle frisbee his career. That includes participating in top-level tournaments, holding clinics to spread the gospel on frisbee skills and opening a store where frisbees and their accoutrements will be on sale.

Auerbach believes there's a market for such a shop, particularly in the Riverdale area where most of Toronto's top frisbee players reside. Playing with a frisbee and inventing games as you go allows the sport to cross generations and cultural lines, he says.

Freestyle frisbee — as opposed to just playing catch with it — involves using the spinning disc in a choreographed routine and manipulating it much like a rhythmic gymnast uses a ball.

Demonstrating the sport for The CJN, Auerbach spins it on his finger, tosses it in the air and catches it while contorted so his catching hand is under his leg. He can roll it across his chest, fling it in the air while doing a couple of spins below. He's not world champ for nothing.

Auerbach was introduced to frisbees while attending summer camp as a kid. The camp's athletic director happened to be a freestyle champion and he wowed the kids with tricks they'd never seen before.

Auerbach eventually learned the "flick" (a sidearm throw), the "overhand wrist flip," the (traditional) backhand throw and even the "overhead (hammer) throw."

Then one day, while attending a Nylons concert at Ontario Place, he was doing tricks on the grassy knoll, when another frisbee enthusiast invited him to "jam" with him and others. They were really adept and Auerbach was so impressed he spent the next few months with them in Kew Gardens in the Beaches learning new tricks and routines.

He was hooked. At his first competition in 1982 on Toronto Island, his team finished fourth.

His partner at the time encouraged him to get greater leg extension and point his feet during the routines; so to get better, Auerbach decided to sign up for martial arts training. When the course was cancelled he decided to enrol in a ballet class.

He also studied jazz and other genres and visualized incorporating dance routines in frisbee performances.

In 1984 he competed in the Mazda U.S. Open in La Mirada, Calif., and in 1985 he went to a competition in Paris. That summer he was part of a cross-Canada tour sponsored by Mac's Milk, in which a group performed in Ottawa on Canada Day and then visited five Western cities in five weeks.

Then, infected with the dancing bug, he decided to hang up his frisbee and devote himself to dance. He auditioned for the School of American Ballet and was accepted in 1986.

For five years, he danced with professional companies in Germany, Hartford and Venezuela and didn't touch a frisbee. In 1990, living in Caracas, where he danced with the National Ballet, he quit dance because "I wanted to be happy. I didn't see anybody who was. Too many people lived and died at the whim of a director."

He started teaching English and met people who played ultimate frisbee. That's a seven-on-seven game played on a football field in which the frisbee is advanced only by passes and one point is scored when the goal line is crossed.

In 1992, he returned to Toronto where he taught ESL students privately and worked in a sporting goods store.

Last summer, he again took up frisbee freestyle. Using his stage experience and dance movements, he choreographed the winning routine at the world championships. "The innovations blew away the competition," he said.

In October, he started his own business, the Spinning Bees Professional Frisbee Team, whose goal is to spread the message of enjoying life though frisbee games. Your imagination is your only limitation, he says.

Auerbach plans to compete in the next world championships in September and open his own store in the near future.

Teen uses bar mitzvah money to help NIF promote peace

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A framed certificate on Jesse Kaplan's bedroom wall is testament to the 13-year-old's belief in promoting peace.

The certificate — which shares wall space with alternative music posters — is from Peace Child, a non-profit Israeli organization which uses theatre workshops as a tool to educate Jewish and Arab youngsters about pluralism, tolerance and the creation of dialogue.

Kaplan donated a substantial portion of his bar mitzvah gift money to Peace Child, a grantee of the New Israel Fund (NIF). He also donated money to NIF grantees South Wing to Zion, which helps Ethiopian olim, and the Israeli section of Defence for Children International, which is devoted to children's rights.

Jesse Kaplan holds a framed certificate from Peace Child — a personal thank you from the Arab and Jewish children who benefit from his donation. [Frances Kraft photo]

Kaplan wanted to use some of his money to help children, and Peace Child especially appealed to him because "it was between Arabs and Jews, to try to make them come together for peace," he said. The quiet-spoken teenager, a Grade 8 student at Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, celebrated his bar mitzvah in September at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

"People don't think of Arabs and Jews together," he said, although he recalls seeing a film in school which depicted the friendship between a Jewish girl and an Arab girl in Israel.

After poring through information about New Israel Fund grantees, Kaplan decided to divide his donation three ways, with the largest chunk going to Peace Child.

The certificate from that organization reads in part, "With this contribution you help us develop dialogue between Arab and Jewish youngsters and promote democracy in Israel." The 18 children's signatures — names like Esther, Ahmad, Gada and Rasmia — are written in a variety of bright colors in Hebrew, English and Arabic.

The children were very moved "to know that another child in Canada cares this much," reports Marsha Slivka, director, New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC), who visited Peace Child on a recent trip to Israel and brought back the certificate.

Kaplan became familiar with the fund through his mother, Rochelle Rubinstein Kaplan, who has served as art director of Sukkah-by-the-Water, a feminist Sukkot service run under the auspices of NIFC, for the past four years.

Reena bash planned

TORONTO — The Reena Foundation's second annual Mardi Gras Ball on March 30 will offer a bit of southern charm to ward off our northern blahs.

This year's ball will take place at 8 p.m. at Toronto's Design Exchange (234 Bay St., in the Toronto-Dominion Centre).

Last year's party at the North York Performing Arts Centre drew some 400 people and raised over $30,000 toward construction of the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Thornhill, Reena's planned drop-in and day-care facility for adults with developmental disabilities.

The goal of this year's bash is to raise $40,000 for the centre.

The ball promises a night of nonstop entertainment, music, dancing, Cajun food, a casino, silent auction and more. Local a capella band The Simpletones will be featured. The players from the hit theatre production Forever Plaid will deliver a medley of tunes from the show.

Revellers may expect flamboyant costumes, stilt-walkers, magicians, clowns and jugglers.

London community faces financial difficulties

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — Like their counterparts elsewhere, the Jewish community's 3,000 members here are asking themselves some hard questions in the face of tight budgets and weakened fundraising.

"These are tough times and we have to prepare ourselves for a new reality," Ted Medzon, president of the London Jewish Federation, told The CJN.

A steering committee has been formed to look at ways to streamline, merge or possibly cut some services in light of a pending dollar crunch at the federation.

Among the possibilities, although remote, is closing the London Jewish Community Centre (JCC), Medzon said.

Recently, the community's quarterly newspaper, the federation-published London Jewish Community News, outlined 11 other possible candidates for cutbacks, including campus services, a babysitting and preschool service, ending the relationship with other federations and even ceasing publication of the newspaper itself.

"I wouldn't say we're in a financial crisis," Medzon said. "But nobody is arguing with the fact that we have to rethink the way we do things. Attitudes toward tzedakah have changed radically."

At a recent meeting of the federation's executive, Medzon reported that the local United Jewish Appeal campaign "has seriously eroded over the last several years."

Medzon said this year's campaign [illegible] over previous years.

The reason is reduced pledges, slow collections and the fact that there are at least 100 households in London which do not contribute to UJA at all, the News reported.

Several programs, services could be cut

London has five main facilities: the JCC, three synagogues and the London Community Hebrew Day School, which enrols 68 children from kindergarten through Grade 6.

But the Federation offers several services and programs which could face the knife, including those for seniors, youth, new immigrants and the sick. It also provides subsidies for children in the day school and for the local on-campus Chabad House.

The entire community is being polled for its input, Medzon said.

"It's being presented in a negative light, but the reaction has been very positive. It's definitely raised awareness."

Among the possibilities for cutbacks being presented to the community are the Israel portion of UJA dollars, the JCC, community programs, including an emergency loan fund, education subsidies, the summer camp and a senior's residence.

London says it is 10th overall among federated Canadian cities in its UJA campaign contributions per person, at $155. First is Montreal at $326 per person. Toronto is ranked sixth at $206 per person.

White supremacists lose forum when conference cancelled

VANCOUVER — A controversial conference to have been held on March 23 has been cancelled by the Surrey Inn, where the meeting had been booked.

The Canadian Free Speech Conference was to have featured speakers connected with the white supremacist Heritage Front, as well as by Jim Keegstra and Victoria lawyer Doug Christie.

"A lot of people were phoning in and complaining. It made it very uncomfortable for us," said a spokesperson for the hotel. "We decided it would be better to cancel it."

The hotel official said the staff did not know what the group stood for when it made the booking.

British Columbia's multiculturalism minister, Ujjal Dosanjh, said he was appalled that the conference had been organized, especially when it was to be held just two days after B.C.'s International Day for the Elimination of Racism on March 21.

Dosanjh said conferences of this type in the past have hidden behind the guise of free speech, while promoting racism.

Marilyn Berger, speaking for the Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region, said it was disconcerting to think that the Surrey Inn would have opened its doors to this type of conference.

BBYO auctions art to raise funds

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) is planning to use the proceeds from a fine art auction to seed a new endowment fund which, it is hoped, will solve a funding problem BBYO has been dealing with here since B'nai Brith Canada cut off support about five years ago.

The auction organized by Park West Gallery of Southfield, Mich., was held recently in the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue's main auditorium and drew about 75 people.

Park West, reports auctioneer George Minarsky, who is based in Toronto, is North America's largest touring art and auction gallery. It holds 20 or more auctions a week throughout North America and comes to Winnipeg at least once a year to hold a public auction, more frequently if asked to do benefits.

BBYO director Marla Adelberg said the organization approoached Park West after a board member remembered seeing the company name on the back of a painting at an art auction house. After a background check, BBYO board members contacted the company.

"They are a great outfit to work with," said Adelberg about Park West. "They sent us the posters and all the invitations. All we had to do was mail them out."

For the fundraiser, Park West brought in 216 works of art, including 20th-century paintings, watercolors and signed graphics, as well as original 18th- and 19th-century graphics by artists such as Renoir, Rembrandt, Picasso, Dali, Miro and Chagall. Some current artists represented were Yaacov Agam, Harold Altman, Yuval Wolfson and Itzchak Tarkay.

Minarsky described Tarkay, a Holocaust survivor and graduate of the Bezalel Art Academy, as the world's most prominent and prolific artist over the past decade. A small work by Tarkay, the first piece to be auctioned, was purchased with a bid of $325.

In total, the auction raised $15,000 of which about 15 percent went to BBYO.

Teachers find unique way of teaching Holocaust

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — An unconventional method of teaching the Holocaust has earned a Hamilton-area teacher a place on the League for Human Rights' Holocaust to Hope Study Tour to Germany, Poland and Israel this summer.

Emilio Del Sordo has been teaching English and drama to grades 10, 11 and 12 students at Parkside High School in Dundas since last September.

Interested in the Holocaust since he studied history in university — his undergraduate thesis, he told The CJN in a recent interview, was on Canada's lack of involvement in the refugee crisis 1938 to 1945 — Del Sordo wants his students, not just to learn the historical facts of the Holocaust, but to understand emotionally how it affected young people like themselves and their families.

He said he wants them to experience the fear and "powerlessness" felt by people who were caught up in the Holocaust.

He does this through dramas he has written and games he devised. He works mostly in the dark, which heightens fear, and he constantly changes the rules.

In the dramas, for instance, "I strip them of their sense of sight and put them in 'family units.' They have to be careful and watch out for themselves and don't know who's going to survive and who won't."

When the kids complain — and he admits that they do get upset — he tells them: "Well, this is what happened."

But he makes sure the students understand it is a game, or roles they are playing in a drama. "I always provide a safety net," he emphasized.

"Kids come into this with all their contemporary notions of what they would have done under Holocaust conditions and what they would have done to survive."

But ultimately, he said, they realize that survival is based mostly on chance and on luck.

A "debriefing" and discussion follow, and then Del Sordo puts everything into historical context with videos, survivors' stories and other readings.

Del Sordo, 28, has been teaching his classes about the Holocaust for three years. He became concerned, he said, when he found that most students knew of the Holocaust only that "it had something to do with the war."

He felt he needed "to put the humanity back into this inhumane act," he explained. But he also, he stressed again, provides the historical context.

He encourages his students to write about and express their feelings and is gratified, he said, that his course "leads the kids to some real soul searching."

Do Government Cutbacks Affect Jewish Women?

By Jill Reitman

Whether we like to face it or not, poverty exists in the Jewish community, and by virtue of the fact that among the Jewish poor approximately 60% are women, recent government cutbacks impact most significantly on this segment of our community.

Statistics reveal that as of 1991, there were 21,455 Jews in Toronto living below or near the poverty line, and that 57.3% of them are women. Women, according to this same demographic report, account for two thirds of seniors who live in poverty and single parents, who are most often women, are twice to three times more likely to be poor than people living in two parent families. The unfortunate reality is, therefore, that government cuts to welfare and social services will have a disproportionate effect on an already vulnerable segment of our population.

Due to government cuts, service agencies in the Jewish community are facing reductions in funding which will impact directly on services for women. For example, almost $400,000 has been cut from the 1996 budget of Jewish Family and Child Service. JF&CS has reported that there will be a reduction in the child welfare budget, family violence services, and family support programs - all of which impact on women.

Furthermore, the 21.6% cut to welfare payments announced earlier this year has severely affected JF&CS clients who receive financial assistance from the Supplemental Assistance Program. These cuts will affect 2000 Jews throughout the city, and as reported, since almost 60% of the Jewish poor are women, the women in our community will be experiencing the greatest burden.

Aside from the effects of government cuts to our Jewish agencies, cuts instituted and/or proposed by the provincial government affecting women in the community at large are numerous and far-reaching, and no doubt impact on Jewish women. Some of these include:

- $2.6 million cut in counselling services to women trying to escape violent spouses.
- Cancellation of 385 non-profit housing projects, primarily affecting single mothers.
- $35 million cut to day care, including 8,650 subsidized spots in Toronto.
- Up to 60% reduction to Legal Aid, a service used primarily by women.
- Elimination of $5 million for second stage housing for battered women, and follow up counselling for women who have left shelters.

The Jewish Women's Federation recently held a seminar organized by Ellen Kachuck Rosenbluth and Danita Dubinsky Aziza, entitled "Government Cutbacks: Women at Risk."

Committee co-chair Rosenbluth commented after the evening: "Budget cuts are a reality of the 1990's. As a result, services that are important to the well being of women and men in our community will be reduced or eliminated."

The program served as a successful beginning in the attempt to link our voluntary organizations and their members with our social agencies, so that we can work together to fill some of the growing gaps in vital programs and services."

Jewish women have always taken the initiative and led the way for all women in the face of social challenges. Now, more than ever, we have a responsibility to get involved, to learn the facts, and be creative in our thinking regarding how we as individuals, and as members of organizations, can begin to meet the needs created by the ever-increasing erosion of our social safety net.

If you belong to an organization that may not currently focus on social issues, consider modifying your own mission for a period of time in order to address cuts to social services.

NOT IN OUR BACKYARD

By Robbie Schwartz M.S.W., C.S.W., Dip. Ed.

One out of every 5-8 Canadian women will be battered at some time in her life. Jewish Family and Child Service indicates that it currently handles over 300 cases of women abuse. Victims come from all socio-economic strata and religious groups. Many of us are shocked by these staggering numbers, but domestic violence is a reality in our community.

The Jewish community should assume a position of ZERO TOLERANCE for Wife Assault.

Wife abuse is not a new phenomenon. The widely used term "Rule of Thumb" is derived from a 1767 English common law which permitted "husbands to enforce domestic discipline in their homes as long as they used a switch or stick no broader than the width of their thumb." In Canada it wasn't until 1968 that cruelty became grounds for divorce. Domestic violence can include only one episode with significant physical or emotional damage, but more frequently it involves repeated incidents that result in either physical injury or symptoms, or psychological damages that interfere with the woman's well-being or ability to function in the family.

The Jewish community is gradually becoming aware that many abused Jewish women have been unrecognized or under-serviced because many of us are victim to commonly held myths about wife assault.

Myth #1: Wife assault is domestic conflict that has run amok.
Myth #2: Men who assault their wives are mentally ill.
Myth #3: Alcohol causes men to beat their wives.
Myth #4: Only poor women get beaten.
Myth #5: Women provoke violence, therefore they deserve what they get.
Myth #6: Women enjoy abuse and find it stimulating.
Myth #7: If women were really bothered by the abuse they would speak up. A corollary to this myth is the belief that if a man feels terrible about the abuse, it will prevent future abuse.
Myth #8: Men who beat their wives are a danger in the community.
Myth #9: Assaulted women could leave their abusive partners if they wanted to.
Myth #10: Pregnant women are protected from attacks.
Myth #11: Jewish men and especially religious men don't abuse their wives.

If you suspect that you may be in an abusive relationship these are questions to think about:

1. Are you able to talk freely on the phone?
2. Do you feel safe?
3. Has your partner ever hurt you?
4. Does your spouse prevent you from choosing your friends and spending time with your family?
5. Are you able to share in financial decisions?
6. Does your spouse discourage you from leaving the house to attend classes or other activities outside the house?

Unfortunately, women in abusive relationships often blame themselves. Because of their perceived failures, they feel a shame so deep, they are often unable to talk about it, rendering them so helpless and afraid they may feel they have no choice but to accept the abuse. Assaulted women often feel isolated from friends and family: being particularly fearful of possible consequences to their children.

The most valuable intervention you can offer someone is to tell her that SHE DID NOTHING TO CAUSE the abuse. Point her in the direction of professional help and most importantly, help her and her children get to a temporary or permanent place of safety. The phone number of the Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto is (416) 638-7800. Kosher meals will be arranged on request.

The Jewish Women's Federation has created a registry of experienced professionals who work with individuals and couples involved in abusive relationships. This registry will be distributed to rabbis, doctors and other professionals.

This spring, Na'amat Canada will be launching a new free legal advisory service for women. If you are a lawyer who is willing to donate time to this service, or if you are a woman in need of this service, please call Na'amat Canada at (416) 636-5425.

If you are interested in participating on a committee which deals with education and advocacy regarding domestic violence, please call JWF at (416) 635-2883 ext. 135.

Wife Assault Prevention

It is estimated that one out of every ten women in Canada is a victim of wife assault. The Jewish community, like any other community, is not immune to this problem. "We believe that many Jewish women are unable to ask for help because of the stigma and because of the perception out there that this is not a problem in our community," says Teri Kay of Jewish Family and Child Service. "Today, because of the difficult times we live in and the uncertainty of the future, women are even more reluctant to seek help. We want women to know we are here, and we are listening."

NEW HELP FOR AGUNOT

BY PEGGY BUCHAN

"No woman deserves to be held prisoner," asserted Joyce Eklove, of the Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, during a telephone interview. Eklove has devoted considerable time and energy giving hope to women whose husbands have refused to give them a Jewish divorce. Such women are often called agunot, or "shackled women."

According to Jewish law, a valid divorce requires that the husband divorce his wife willingly. He must voluntarily give her a get, which is a written confirmation of his intent to divorce her. Without a valid get, a woman may not remarry. If she has children with a second husband, these children are mamzerim.

FEDERATION BYLAW ENACTED

The Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation played a significant role in a recent decision made by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto to enact a bylaw prohibiting spouses who refuse to properly divorce their spouse, from holding positions on any Federation committee.

The Federation is the first major Jewish institution to take such measures in North America, and it is hoped that others will follow its lead.

NEW HELPLINE

The Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get recently installed a new Jewish Divorce Helpline. The primary purpose of the Helpline is to provide information and support to women whose husbands refuse to give them a get. Anyone interested may use the Helpline to obtain information from trained volunteers about the get process. All telephone conversations are confidential. Call (416) 782-7999.

Sometimes women simply do not know how a get is obtained, or their husbands are merely lazy, not immoral. Once they understand the process, the get can be quickly obtained, Eklove explained.

For women whose husbands are not so easily persuaded, provisions in the Federal Divorce Act and the Ontario Family Act may help in some cases. Information about these provisions at an early stage in the civil proceedings is vital, as many family lawyers are unfamiliar with the issues of Jewish divorce.

SYNAGOGUE PARTICIPATION URGED

In addition to the Helpline, the Coalition has sent letters to many congregational rabbis across the country, urging them to offer their support, and demonstrate that they take the agunot issue seriously. The rabbis were asked to speak about the anguish of agunot in their High Holiday sermons. They were also asked to implement rules similar to the Federation bylaw, denying synagogue membership to recalcitrant husbands. Eklove was pleased with the rabbis' response. From Orthodox to Reform, many wrote back and some even telephoned.

CONFRONTING THE TRUTH about Women and Substance Abuse

BY JUDI LEVITA

"It's time to wake up. I've lost four (Jewish) friends to overdoses and each of their deaths was attributed to other causes by their parents. The attitude in this community is absolutely pathetic. Open your eyes, because if it's not your child, it's someone else's."

Those were the words of Sarah (pseudonym), a 36 year old mother of two and former addict who related how she used cocaine and heroin for 17 years, abstaining only on Shabbat and during her two pregnancies.

Sarah courageously volunteered her story at an educational program presented by the Social and Political Action Committee of Jewish Women's Federation. Her personal battle with drug abuse brought home the message that Toronto's Jewish community has to face reality. Substance abuse is a Jewish problem too, and women have to take responsibility for their own health.

Women and Substance Abuse: Confronting the Truth, A Forum on Awareness and Prevention served as an excellent starting point for changing attitudes. It also helped generate awareness about a problem that hasn't gone away by denying its existence. The forum was moderated by Dr. Jill Goldberg Reitman, a Vice-President of the Jewish Women's Federation. The panel consisted of Dr. Bonnie Madonik, Director of the Donwood Institute, Freda Muscovitch, Drug and Alcohol Network Coordinator for the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Toronto, and Rochelle Thompson, a therapist in private practice who has worked for the Jewish Family and Child Service.

Sarah started using LSD at the age of 13. She attributes her addiction to feelings of isolation and falling in with the "wrong crowd" after being sexually abused by someone outside her home. She stopped using drugs in 1990. According to Sarah, programs in Toronto were either in church basements or hospitals. Having grown up in a typical secular Zionist home in North York, she was not comfortable in either situation. Sarah approached numerous rabbis for help after becoming religious. All but one told her that it couldn't really be true or that much of a problem. The rabbi who acknowledged the truth put her on a plane to Los Angeles and arranged for her to receive treatment at a Jewish drug facility. There was nothing comparable in Toronto.

Sarah has been "clean" for five years and is currently working on a proposal for a drug rehabilitation program that is geared to the Jewish community. However, she still maintains an addiction to cigarettes. And although less shameful and more socially acceptable than illicit drugs, the effects of tobacco on women and their unborn children are also devastating.

According to Dr. Madonik, tobacco kills three times more people than alcohol, AIDS, illicit drugs, automobile accidents, murder and suicide combined. More women are dying of lung cancer than breast cancer, and women who smoke have a 13 times greater risk of developing cancer of the cervix than those who don't. "It's never too late to quit because it is possible to reduce many of tobacco's harmful effects," Madonik implored the audience.

S&P is doing its part by advocating for improved labeling about the hazards of tobacco on cigarette packages. A petition was circulated during the program and forwarded to Ontario's Minister of Health.

The statistics presented about tobacco, alcohol, prescription drugs, and illegal drugs were startling. Women are twice as likely than men to use prescription narcotics, and the risks from alcohol abuse include failure to ovulate, fetal alcohol syndrome, and cirrhosis of the liver.

More than one panelist pointed out that when it comes to substance abuse and the reasons for starting, women are different than men. In particular, domestic and sexual violence were cited as the dominant catalysts.

In order to receive treatment on a continual basis, better daycare for women in drug and alcohol treatment programs must be made available. Attendees at the S&P forum learned that many women simply can't access treatment programs because of inadequate or nonexistent childcare services. A second petition was circulated and sent to Metro Council and the Premier's office to express the dire need for daycare services and better resources for women in various stages of the treatment process.

The need for advocacy of these issues still continues. The Supreme Court of Canada recently ruled that tobacco manufacturers can advertise their products in the marketplace once again, and Ontario's new provincial government under Premier Mike Harris has introduced sweeping cuts to social programs, including subsidized daycare.

Panelist Rochelle Thompson focused on four myths in the Jewish community and how they stand between women getting help. It's not true that "Jews don't drink," or "this is not a women's issue", or "if someone doesn't use drugs daily that it's not a problem", or "it's not a problem if no one says anything about it." Ironically, Sarah pointed out that if there had been more awareness and compassion in the community, she probably would have stopped a lot earlier. Instead, she used drugs for 17 years and her children were eight and nine years old before she stopped completely.

JWF continues to do its part to raise awareness and counter the denial that exists in the community. A resource booklet about substance abuse was produced by the S&P committee. For copies of the poster or to participate on a committee, please call JWF at (416) 635-2883 ext. 135.

היום שבו ירו בראש הממשלה:

Students plan book drive for African country

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Stacey Levinson and Melissa Leibl, Grade 9 students at Garden City Collegiate in north Winnipeg, are leading a campaign to collect used books and other school supplies to send to kids in Malawi, a small country in southern Africa.

The graduates of the Hebrew bilingual program at Centennial School were inspired by a speaker, Strini Reddy, executive director of the Manitoba Association of School Superintendents, who was originally from South Africa. Reddy came to their school in December and spoke about the extreme lack of school supplies for African students.

"They are short of books, desks, paper and pens," Levinson says. "There might be one pen per classroom."

With the help of three other girls — Sara Greenfield, Liz Kornaga and Lisa Fairweather — and Ashok Athavale, a school guidance counsellor, they began to try to alleviate the situation — at least in Malawi. They sent out one shipment before the Christmas holidays to an address Reddy gave them. In January, they sent faxes to all schools in the Seven Oaks School Division of Winnipeg.

"We welcome any kind of books, as long as they are in English," says Leibl.

Currently, they have about 700 books they have boxed during lunch hours. Reddy, they report, is negotiating with a church group to ship them out and Athavale is looking for funding to send the boxes to Malawi.

Leibl and Levinson say family and friends think what they are doing is a good idea and are encouraging them. They have also written pen pal letters to students in Malawi.

Refugee problem on agenda

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Canada, Israel and the New Middle East will be discussed at a one-day conference at Temple Anshe Sholom, 215 Cline Ave. N., April 28, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

The keynote speaker will be Howard Adelman of the Centre for Refugee Studies at York University, who will give an overview of the Middle East refugee problem and an insider's view of Canada's role in the Multicultural Group on Refugees.

In other sessions, Lorraine Weinrib of the University of Toronto (U of T) will discuss the influence of Canada's Charter of Rights on the development of constitutional rights in Israel; Harold Troper of U of T and Yigal Donyets of the Joint Authority for Jewish Zionist Education in Jerusalem will present two perspectives on the relationship between Israel and Canadian Jewry; Rabbi Dow Marmur of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple will discuss the relationship between Reform Judaism and Zionism; and Arye Rattner of Haifa University, currently visiting professor at York University, will explore the undercurrent in Israeli society in which organizations or individuals claim the right to take the law into their own hands.

The conference is sponsored by UJA/Jewish Federation, Temple Anshe Sholom and ARZA Canada.

Registration fee of $20.00 per person, including luncheon and keynote speaker, must be paid by April 21 at the temple office. Admission to all other sessions, in advance or at the door, is $5.00; free for students. For more information, call 905-528-0121.

Acharai '96 planned

MONTREAL — One hundred and fifty young adults from across Canada will travel to Kiev, Ukraine, and to Israel, as part of Acharai '96, Canada's National Young Leadership Mission.

Acharai '96 welcomes participants aged 25 to 40 from all regions of Canada. The mission is scheduled to run from July 22 to Aug. 1.

This mission is organized by Montreal's FEDERATION CJA Young Adult Division (YAD), Toronto United Jewish Appeal Young Leadership Cabinet and United Israel Appeal of Canada.

Information sessions for Acharai '96 take place on the evening of April 16 in Montreal and April 17 in Toronto. Contact Glenn J. Nashen, director of YAD in Montreal (514-345-2637), or Elliot Halperin, campaign associate in Toronto (416-631-5734), or 1-800-567-ISRAEL.

WHY IS THIS PASSOVER DIFFERENT FROM ALL OTHER PASSOVERS?

Passover marks the birth of the Jews as a people. And this year marks 3,000 years since King David dedicated Jerusalem as Israel's capital. This makes Passover 5756 a once-in-a-lifetime event.

WHY IS AN INVESTMENT IN ISRAEL BONDS DIFFERENT FROM ALL OTHER INVESTMENTS?

Israel bonds link you and the Jewish homeland. By considering an investment in Israel bonds, you commemorate this season of freedom and help build Israel's future as well as your own.

A NEW IDEA FOR AN AHKDAMAH PRIZE

Commentary

The screaming headline Being Jewish on the cover of New York magazine (Jan. 29) attracted me, as a journalist, to the 10,000-word article by another journalist, Philip Weiss. As reportage it's first rate, but I differ with his personal opinions that anti-Semitism is no longer a factor in our lives, and that Jews should free up the American dream by dropping the role of "outsiders" and "victims."

He writes: "As an American Jew, I have a largely unlimited social and professional scope: I'm free to do almost anything I want in this society, including 'marrying out.' "

As a man who did "marry out," Weiss doesn't hide his attraction to the WASP establishment, but neither does he hide his debt to and his affection for his Jewish inheritance.

Weiss writes about concern in the Jewish community about assimilation and of a survey showing that 52 percent of Jewish men are marrying non-Jews, but in the end he fobs off responsibility. He argues that if by the year 2076 there are at the most only one-sixth as many Jews left, all fundamentalists, well, that's a process we have to live with.

And yet, he wonders, as I do, even two generations from now, how the children who are one-half or one-quarter Jewish will fare in the face of an onslaught against Jews.

He writes: "As anti-Semitism fades and Jews assume ever-greater prominence throughout the establishment, it's time for Jewish Americans to let go of the idea that they are outsiders."

As a Canadian, I cannot agree that anti-Semitism is fading in this country. It may be that the "melting pot" experience in the United States has lessened anti-Semitism as Weiss perceives it. Though many Canadians have risen to the tops of their fields, whether in the professions or in business, I deem it foolhardy to suggest that we blind side anti-Semitism.

In all, Weiss makes a brilliant defence of his own privileges, without ignoring the historical reasons for the Holocaust and other Jewish tragedies.

He raises rightly, in my opinion, the issue of prejudice amongst Jews against other people, and quotes without comment his 70-year-old scientist father's remark: "We know the harm of anti-Semitism. What harm can there be in a minority's feelings against Christians?"

The author is at his best in describing the ambivalence of a Jew's feeling about doing well in a non-Jewish world, but I find repugnant his idea that in this hi-tech and information highway age, we should let assimilation run its course and take our chances. This notion flies in the face of those who believe in Jewish continuity.

In fact, there is something hollow at the centre of Weiss' position, that we can be thankful that our Jewish roots helped us make it, but now we can kiss those roots goodbye. I wonder what the chalutzim who helped build the modern state of Israel think of that argument.

There are many much more proficient than I am at refuting the implications of Weiss' article that as Jews we can somehow cut ourselves off from our past, treat Israel at arm's length and go for the brass ring.

As one born in Canada, who feels comfortable in Canada, and who achieved a certain success in my profession, despite many instances of anti-Semitism along the way, his arguments cry out against my Jewish soul. Yes, perhaps I am reacting emotionally, but to me it is another form of Jewish denial, and I want no part of it.

Auschwitz Museum director urged to resign over mall

CALGARY — The current director of the Auschwitz Museum should resign and make way for "a younger, English-speaking director who displays better understanding of Jewish sensitivities," said Sigmund Sobolewski, a Polish-Catholic survivor of the Nazi death camp.

Jerzy Wroblewski is taking a leading role in defending the construction of the controversial shopping mall across the street from Auschwitz, said Sobolewski, spokesperson for the Alberta-based Auschwitz Awareness Society. The mall has come under attack by numerous people, including Catholic Archbishop Jean-Marie Lustiger, who see it as an affront to those who died in the death camp.

Wroblewski has said recently he will close a recently renovated 100-seat restaurant, a book store and flower shop in Auschwitz so the mall will have a better chance of succeeding, Sobolewski claimed.

He also took Wroblewski to task for "holding back a memorial plaque from Canada for the Jewish heroes of the sonderkommando (men who worked in the gas chamber/crematoria area) revolt ... because this plaque is unilingual (English)."

While placement of that plaque had been refused since 1990, it took only six weeks in 1995 for Wroblewski to approve a unilingual plaque in Polish for the controversial A-K underground, some of whose units hunted and killed Jewish partisans, Sobolewski said.

Sobolewski also criticized Wroblewski for failing to inform foreign delegates of the International Auschwitz Council, of which he is a member, about the mall in four meetings held in 1994 and 1995.

SKI CHAMPS

For the first time in the school's history, the ski team from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto qualified for the provincial championship of the Ontario Federation of Schools Athletic Association. CHAT's downhill ski team raced to victory at Mansfield ski slopes near Barrie. They competed against 16 schools in the recreational ski category and won by a mere two seconds. The team, seen here with their coach Ray Buchowski (left) consists of (from left) Jordan Glick, Brian Laski, Danny Holland, Harley Gold, Ari Rosenzwig, Shael Sacks, Nathan Perlus and David Harrel.

Bombing's personal for one Montrealer

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When Nancy Zangwill heard the news of two suicide bombings in Israel, she sadly was able to put a face to the death toll of 26.

One of the Jerusalem bus victims was Sarah Duker, who was Zangwill's roommate when they were students at the Pardes Institute for Jewish Studies in 1994.

Duker, a native of Teaneck, N.J., was the first person Zangwill met when she went to Israel and they soon became friends.

"I remember shopping and preparing for Shabbat with her. Welcoming friends to our home, worrying about each other coming home safely," Zangwill said, her voice breaking, at a memorial vigil on the steps of the McGill University Student Union Building the day after the tragedy.

Zangwill, who is editor of FEDERATION CJA's In magazine for young adults, recalled her friend as charming and soft-spoken, but nevertheless holding strong opinions and being totally dedicated to Jewish life. Only 20, she was in the institute's most advanced Torah class that year.

Duker, a Hebrew University student, died with her boyfriend.

About 120 students attended the noon-hour commemoration organized by the Jewish Student Coalition. They condemned and mourned the senselessness of the deaths.

Student Essie Vineberg said this terrorist attack was especially touching for her because so many of the victims were young people, either soldiers or university students, going about their daily routine. "But unlike our Israeli contemporaries, we do not have to constantly look over our shoulders."

Knowing the names and something about the lives of Jews who die in terrorist attacks is the "sacred obligation" of Jews everywhere, said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, holding up an Israeli newspaper with photos of the dead. "They died because of the hatred of Israel and of the Jewish people," he said.

He read out the name of each victim, many of them only in their teens or 20s.

Rabbi Poupko said Palestinian president Yasser Arafat shares much of the blame for their deaths because he praised Yehiya Ayyash, Hamas' top bombmaker, as a "great martyr" at his funeral.

"Violent speech leads to violent acts ... Those who praise murderers are guilty. Arafat is guilty," Rabbi Poupko said. He also called on Canada to sever relations with Iran, which he accused of aiding militant Islamic groups.

Hillel president Sarah Tatham said that Jews her age had believed they had entered a time of "reconciliation not bloodshed" and still hope that they will see an end to violence in Israel in their lifetime.

Canadian Institute for Jewish Research director Fred Krantz noted that over 160 Israelis have died since the signing of the peace treaty with the PLO in Washington in September 1993.

"We hope, but tragically the end is not yet in sight. We feel terrible frustration, righteous anger, that, paradoxically, [these deaths] are the bitter spawn of Israel's pursuit of peace."

He said Prime Minister Shimon Peres should suspend negotiations with Arafat until the PLO amends its covenant which calls for the destruction of Israel.

PASSOVER FOODS

Now you can have your cake and eat it too!

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

You'll never believe this cake is pesachdig'' proclaims a Passover recipe headnote in a ladies auxiliary cookbook. This is a phrase and a sentiment one encounters all too frequently in Jewish cookbooks' Passover section.

Sure, the constraints are considerable: no wheat flour, no traditional leavening, no regular pure alcohol based vanilla and other extracts, and usually butter free (Passover desserts are usually made with no fat or oil in order to be served with meat based seder meals). Happily, lots has changed in the last few years and the availability and spectrum of Passover baking ingredients has grown extensively. You can now get kosher-for-Passover cocoa, brown sugar, vanilla powder, chocolate chips and sweet baking margarine.

Passover desserts do have a particular criterion that present an unusual challenge. The trick is to combine classic pastry techniques and imagination along with the Passover culinary credo. You'll be surprised at what you can do.

MOCK CHESTNUT TORTE

Torte

10 oz. good quality semi sweet chocolate, melted
1½ cups mashed sweet potatoes*
⅓ cup sugar
1 tbsp. Passover vanilla sugar
1 tsp. Passover rum extract, optional
4 oz. unsalted Passover margarine
6 large egg yolks
6 large egg whites
¼ tsp. salt
¼ cup sugar

Top Garnish

Sifted cocoa powder
Curls of Semi Sweet Chocolate and/or:

Chocolate Ganache Glaze

6 oz. semi-sweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
½ cup water

* These are best baked, rather than boiled as they will take in less water. However, if boiling (to save time) be sure to drain well, chill slightly, then mash potatoes before using.

Prepare sweet potatoes beforehand.

Preheat oven to 350 degrees F. Line a nine inch springform pan with baking parchment. Melt chocolate over a double boiler and set aside to cool.

Cream the unsalted margarine or butter with the ⅓ cup sugar and vanilla sugar. Blend in the egg yolks, mashed sweet potatoes, rum extract and cooled chocolate.

In another clean bowl, whip the egg whites gently to allow them to get a bit foamy. Then add in the salt and whip on a higher speed, slowly dusting in the sugar to form stiff, glossy, but not dry, peaks. Fold one-third of egg whites into sweet potato/chocolate mixture and work in well to loosen. Then, gently fold in remaining two-thirds of egg whites, blending well but taking care not to deflate the mixture. Spoon into prepared pan and bake until done, about 40 minutes. Cake rises somewhat and looks dry, and slightly cracked on top when done.

Passover Foods

New baking products make for a tasty Pesach

Middle should be soft but firm. Cool in pan 20 minutes, then remove to a wire rack. At this point, cake can be frozen until needed. Even if serving same day, chill cake for an hour or two before finishing with ganache glaze.

Ganache Glaze

Bring the water to a gentle boil and add in the chopped chocolate all at once. Remove from heat and stir briskly, using a wire whisk, until all of the chocolate melts and you have a thick glaze or sauce-like topping. Refrigerate for an hour or so. (You can also make this ahead and refrigerate it up to a week or two. Simply warm it up to right temperature for glazing cake. Also cake can be frozen for a month).

Invert cake onto a cardboard circle or decorative cake plate (so that smooth, flat bottom faces up). Pour glaze over cake, using a metal spatula to even out glaze and spread along sides. Instead of glaze, you can also simply sift some cocoa over top of cake or curls of chocolate (using a vegetable peeler and a warmish chocolate bar). Cake can also be offered with a pureed raspberry sauce, garnished with chocolate shavings, or left as is, with a citrus leaf, sweetheart rose or couple of berries in the centre.

Serves 12 to 16.

FUDGE MACAROON BARS

- 6 oz. melted semi sweet chocolate
- 1 cup unsalted butter or unsalted Passover margarine
- 1½ cups Passover brown sugar
- 1 tbsp. Passover vanilla sugar
- 3 eggs
- ¾ cup matzah cake meal
- ¼ cup potato starch
- 1½ cups lightly packed quartered or coarsely chopped Passover macaroons (any brand or flavor)

Preheat oven to 350 degrees F. Lightly grease 8 by 10 inch or 7 by 11 inch brownie pan or (in a pinch, a 9 by 9 inch baking pan will do).

Melt chocolate and margarine over low heat. Cool to room temperature. Stir in brown sugar, vanilla sugar, eggs, potato starch, and cake meal. Stir in macaroon pieces.

Spoon batter into prepared pan. Bake about 40 to 50 minutes, until top seems set and is beginning to take on a crackled appearance. Do not overbake. Brownies should be set and seem dry to touch — but there should not be a dry crust around sides.

30 squares approximately.

PESACH CRISP AND CHEWY CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

- 1¼ cups Passover brown sugar
- ½ cup white sugar
- 2 tbsp. Passover vanilla sugar
- 1 cup unsalted butter (or unsalted Passover margarine)
- 2 eggs
- ¼ tsp. salt
- ½ cup matzah meal
- ½ cup cake meal
- 1 cup potato starch
- 2 cups chocolate chips

Cream brown sugar, white sugar, vanilla sugar with butter. Blend in eggs. Stir in salt, matzah meal, cake meal, potato starch and chocolate. Chill dough for an hour or overnight. (Freezes well).

Preheat oven to 350 F. Line a couple of baking sheets with parchment paper.

Scoop large tablespoonfuls of dough onto sheet — leave room for spreading. For smaller cookies, use a generous teaspoonful of dough.

Bake until done, 14 to 16 minutes. Let sit on baking sheet to cool and set up. Use a metal spatula to remove. Chill cookies before packing/handling or serving.

4 to 5 dozen.

Variations:

Pecan Sandies: Omit chocolate chips and replace with chopped pecans. Use only brown sugar, no white sugar.

Passover Blondies: Lightly grease a 9 by 13 inch pan (for thin squares) or an 8 by 11 inch brownie pan (for thick and chewy squares). Press cookie batter into pan. Bake at 350 F for 25 to 35 minutes.

Broiled veggies taste great

People with real dedication play golf in November and basketball in March and get their barbeques ready for Pesach. We admire them — and suggest these tips for great (and healthy) veggies.

You can use the same techniques on the broiler, by the way.

Eggplant: Slice lengthwise ¼ inch thick. Sprinkle with salt. Brush with olive oil. Grill covered 12 to 15 minutes, turn often. Baste with garlic or herbed oil. Grilled eggplant is delicious with chicken and lamb when chopped and combined with chopped tomatoes and basil.

Peppers: Slice sweet peppers in thirds, seed them, brush lightly with garlic-laced olive or other cooking oil (or leave unoiled and foil-wrap them). Grill 15 to 20 minutes over a low flame, turning frequently, or cook until the skins are charred, then peel them and serve. Lightly dressed with vinaigrette, grilled peppers are a terrific side dish with burgers or steak. Peeled and pureed, they make a tangy sauce for fish, beef, chicken and lamb.

Tomatoes: Halve ripe tomatoes, brush lightly with oil, then grill over moderate flame 5 to 6 minutes, turning several times to cook evenly. Ideal with burgers, kebabs and steak.

Zucchini: Slice lengthwise ½ inch thick. Brush with oil, then grill over moderate flame 4 to 6 minutes, turning often. Excellent when sprinkled with chopped basil, oregano or tarragon.

Passover Foods

Passover cooking need not be fattening

The Intermountain Jewish News

DENVER, Colo. – In the early 1980s, when Americans started counting fat grams and watching cholesterol intake, Denverite Gail Ashkanazi-Hankin decided to continue that healthful vigil during Passover.

The result is Passover Lite, a cookbook just released by Pelican Publishing Co. Ashkanazi-Hankin spent a decade developing, collecting and adapting recipes that fulfill three categories of requirements:

* kosher for Passover;
* low in fat and cholesterol;
* tasty and attractive.

Passover Lite is a collection of nearly 200 tested recipes that include healthy versions of traditional Passover foods as well as contemporary, multi-ethnic foods that are also kosher for Passover and healthful. She draws from Mexican, Asian and North African cuisines to add variety to the book so the eight days of Passover are anything but boring when it comes to cooking and eating.

For the past 12 years, Ashkanazi-Hankin has been a teacher at Denver's Temple Sinai religious and preschools. She is also an artist and illustrated her cookbook with original line-art drawings throughout the text. She used watercolor and colored pencil to create the book jacket art.

The book includes cooking and time-saving tips, snack and lunch suggestions and sample menus for several kinds of seders: first and second night, Sephardi and vegetarian.

The author may be reached at 303-771-3559 or by E-mail, LHANKIN@AOL.COM.

The book may be ordered through Pelican Publishing Co., 800-843-1724. Following are sample breakfast, lunch and dinner recipes from Passover Lite:

Skillet Matzah Brei

Cooking spray
2 tsp. oil
4 matzahs
4 egg whites
1/2 tsp. onion powder, or to taste
1/4 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. black pepper

Coat a large non-stick skillet or griddle with cooking spray and add 1/2 tsp. of the oil. Heat the skillet over medium-high heat until very hot. Meanwhile, moisten the matzah with cold water and crumble into a bowl. Add the egg whites and seasonings. Spoon half the mixture into the hot skillet or griddle as one large pancake and brown.

With a wide spatula, lift the matzah and add another 1/2 tsp of oil.

Turn to brown the other side. Repeat with remaining mixture and oil.

Serves 4.

Tuna in a Green Pepper Boat

Dressing:
1/4 cup low-sodium tomato juice
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. onion powder
1/4 tsp. paprika
Pinch black pepper, or to taste

In a small bowl, combine the dressing ingredients.

Tuna Salad:

1 6 1/2-oz. can water-packed tuna, drained
1 tbsp. green or red pepper, minced
1 small carrot, shredded
1 green pepper, halved lengthwise and seeded

In another bowl, combine the tuna, carrot and minced pepper.

Pour the dressing into the tuna salad and mix thoroughly. Fill the green pepper halves. Serves 1 to 2.

Chicken in Orange Sauce

6 4-oz. chicken breast halves, skinned
3 tbsp. orange juice concentrate, thawed
1 cup defatted chicken broth or water
3 whole cloves
1 3-inch cinnamon stick
1/8 tsp. black pepper
Pinch cayenne pepper to taste
1 1/2 tsp. potato starch
Orange slices for garnish
Parsley sprigs

In a non-stick skillet, over medium-high heat, brown the chicken breast on both sides in the orange juice concentrate and 1/2 cup of the broth for about 15 to 20 minutes.Add the cloves, cinnamon stick, pepper, cayenne, and 1/2 cup of the broth. Bring to a boil.

Reduce the heat to medium-low, cover, and simmer for 7 to 10 minutes or until the chicken is no longer pink inside. With the remaining 1/4 cup broth, blend in the potato starch until smooth. Add this mixture to the skillet and stir until the gravy thickens and begins to bubble.

Arrange the chicken on a platter and pour the sauce over all or pass the sauce around to individual plates.

Garnish with the orange slices and parsley. Serves 4 to 6.

Broccoli Knishes

1 cup mashed potatoes
1/3 cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. potato starch
1/2 small onion, finely chopped
2 egg whites or 1/4 cup Passover egg substitute
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1/4 tsp. salt
1 cup fresh or frozen broccoli, steamed and finely chopped

Preheat the oven to 375 degrees.

In a bowl combine the potatoes, matzah meal, potato starch, onion, egg whites, pepper and salt and knead together. Divide the dough into six balls and flatten each. Divide the broccoli evenly onto each circle, fold over, and press edges to seal. Generously coat a baking sheet with the cooking spray. Arrange the knishes in a single layer and place the baking sheet on the bottom rack of the oven. Bake for 15 minutes on each side. Serve hot. Serves 6.

Jewish recipes from here and there outlined in a new cookbook

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

It's always fun to compare your (or your family's) food customs and likes and dislikes with other people's. It's especially fun to see other ethnic groups, when they all happen to be Jewish.

Malvina Liebman's Jewish Cookery from Boston to Baghdad (NightinGale Resources) is not a new book. However, when I came across it, I was enchanted.

The recipes, from such diverse locales as China, Barcelona, Holland, South Carolina, Bavaria, India and Greece, are interesting to make and eat. Tuna is made with prunes and apples, eggs and olives are added to a beef stew, veal is roasted with tehina.

What is most entertaining about this book is the extensive discussions of local customs and history. I didn't know that in Greece, armico, a chicken, tomato and wine sweet and sour stew, is the preferred erev Yom Kippur dish; that bay leaves come from the laurel tree or that ghivetch, a Romanian vegetable stew, is the same thing as the Turkish Turlu. And just as good.

The book can be found at some Jewish bookstores, or ordered from the publisher, NightinGale Resources, Box 322, Cold Spring, N.Y. 10506.

BAKED MARINATED BRISKET

(as Rashi would have eaten)

5 lb. brisket
8 potatoes, peeled and quartered
1½ carrots, in 1 in. pieces
3 tomatoes, peeled and chopped

Marinade

¼ cup Passover oil
2 onions, chopped
3 cloves garlic, chopped
1 bay leaf
2 tsp. dried thyme
2 tsp. dried marjoram
½ cup parsley, finely chopped
1 cup dry red Passover wine
10 peppercorns
2 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. lemon juice

Combine all the marinade ingredients in a saucepan and simmer for 25 minutes. Cool. Place meat in a pan just large enough to hold it and pour marinade over it. Pierce meat all over with a large tined fork and turn from time to time during a 24 hour period. It need not be refrigerated the whole time.

Place the meat in a casserole with the strained marinade. Arrange the potatoes and carrots around the meat. Cover and bake in a pre-heated oven for about two hours. Add the chopped tomatoes and continue baking uncovered for another hour or until very tender. Serves 10 to 12.

ROASTED ONIONS

A wall painting of ancient Egypt in the Oriental Division of the New York Public Library shows workers watering and weeding onion patches. The bulb was held in such high esteem that it was worshipped as a symbol of the gods.

4 large yellow onions, unpeeled
4 tbsp. butter or pareve Passover margarine
1 tsp. paprika

Trim, but do not peel, the onions. Cut a cross in the root end. Place onions in a lightly-greased baking pan. Roast in a preheated 400-degree oven for about 1½ hrs., or until cooked but not limp. Peel. Pour the melted butter or margarine over and sprinkle with paprika. Serves 4.

Real estate broker serves up new dishes

Jan Kliaman is a real estate broker with a difference — she loves to cook and bake. Using her late mother's recipes as a springboard, she collects, tests and publishes recipes that are easy to make, delicious and heimish.

Her My Mother's Cookbook was published last year. She is now working on another book, with more family recipes and other favorite dishes.

Kliaman would welcome readers' family recipes to include in her new book. Call her at 416-398-7653.

PASSOVER — MERINGUE MACAROONS

2 egg whites (large size)
⅔ cup sugar
2 tsp. lemon juice
½ lemon rind — grated
1½ cups unsweetened coconut — finely grated

Preheat oven to 300 F. Line two cookie sheets with lightly greased foil.

Beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in sugar until very stiff. Fold in lemon juice, rind and 1 cup coconut. Gently fold in remaining coconut.

On prepared cookie sheets, use a spoon and form into mounds about 1½ inches in diameter. Bake for 17-19 minutes or until light beige. Turn oven off. Leave baking sheets in oven with door slightly ajar for 20 minutes. Remove cookie sheets from oven. Let stand 5 minutes. Remove cookies from foil and cool on cookie rack.

Variations:

(a) Combine ½ tsp. cinnamon with sugar and beat into egg whites.

(b) Substitute orange juice and rind for lemon juice and rind. Gently fold in ⅓ cup grated semi-sweet chocolate with coconut.

PASSOVER SWEET KUGEL

3 potatoes, peeled and grated
6 carrots, peeled and grated
2 onions, finely chopped
⅓ cup pineapple — drained (crushed or chopped)
½ cup raisins
6 eggs
¼ cup oil
3 tbsp. sugar
⅔ cup matzah meal
Salt to taste
Pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 350 F. Lightly grease a 9 x 9 inch oven-proof glass baking pan.

In a mixing bowl, stir together potatoes and carrots. Add onions, pineapple and raisins. Mix in eggs and oil. Then add sugar, matzah meal, salt and pepper.

Pour into prepared pan. Bake for 1 hour. Serves 8.

And from My Mother's Cookbook:

BAKED GEFILTE FISH

2 carrots, peeled and grated
2 onions, chopped
1 tbsp. oil
3 eggs, beaten
2 lbs. fish — chopped
¾ cup cold water — add gradually
¼ cup sugar or 1 tsp. liquid artificial sweetener (or less — to taste
3 tbsp. matzah meal
1 tsp. salt
Pepper — to taste

Preheat oven to 350 F. Line a 4 x 11 inch pate terrine with lightly greased foil.

Saute carrots and onions in oil until onions are transparent.

In an electric mixer, blend eggs, fish, water, sugar, matzo meal, salt and pepper. Add carrots and onions and mix for a total of 4 minutes. Pour mixture into prepared terrine.

Bake uncovered for 70 minutes, using a cookie tray (with sides) underneath to protect oven.

When done, invert on a plate and remove foil. Cool and refrigerate.

For additional information, call the Kashruth Council of Toronto, 416-635-9550.

CLARIFICATION

Some readers have expressed concern that the lead article in the March 21 Passover Food supplement contained recipes with chametz.

We wish to remind our readers that Eileen Goltz, a regular contributor to our food supplements, was writing about using up the last bits of pasta, flour and rice before Passover, rather than throwing them out. This was stated quite clearly in the body of the article.

Goltz and The CJN take great care to use only acceptable ingredients in our Passover recipes.

We regret the confusion.

Zareinu dollars give boost to local school

Leslie Schwartz (left) buys Zareinu dollars from volunteer Sarah Morel at the Spring Farm Food City. Morel spends two days a week there, urging shoppers to support the school. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Sure, shopping for Pesach puts an incredible dent in anyone's budget. But it is less painful using Zareinu dollars.

Zareinu dollars have been around for several years and have proven popular with users, and a very real help to Zareinu, a school for the multiple handicapped.

Participants "buy" Zareinu dollars in denominations of $10, $20 or $50 and use them in regular shopping. Participating stores donate a percentage back to the school.

The results have so far been excellent, raising between $50,000 and $60,000 a year, according to Bubu Zlotnick, a spokesperson for the project.

He had special praise for the coordinators, who collect the money and arrange for it to be distributed. Many distributers deliver it directly to participants' houses for greater convenience. Some station themselves in major supermarkets.

The Zareinu dollars program has helped the school "offer new therapies and progressive communication techniques to our children, in the form of a Total Communication and Life Skills Program," explain Zareinu principals Carol Goldman and Marion Goldmintz.

Zareinu is also proud of its infant intervention program, which aims to give handicapped infants a head start in motor control.

The need for financial assistance for the school is great. The long waiting list is made up partly of families who have attempted unsuccessfully to integrate their special needs children into Hebrew day schools. In addition, many children return in the higher grades, either because Hebrew schools have turned them away or because public schools were not able to meet their cultural needs.

As well, government cutbacks have affected not only public school services, but support agencies which used to subsidize many families. Cutbacks to WheelTrans have created chaos and hardship in transporting the children.

"We really appreciate the women who handle the Zareinu dollars, the stores that participate and the public who help us," Zlotnick said.

Kibbutzniks discover pre-cooked food trays

Jerusalem Dateline

Israeli kibbutzniks who have been eating off trays in communal dining halls over a lifetime — breakfast, lunch and dinner — have come up with pre-cooked food trays that not only preserve their contents for up to a year, but also help preserve the environment.

While biodegradable and recyclable plastics are popular, up until now, packaging for "shelf-stable" pre-cooked meals — with a shelf-life of up to one year — have ended up in the trash can rather than in recycling hoppers. The reason is that conventional plastic packaging trays designed for storage without refrigeration are made of several layers of plastic containing EVOH (alcohol), which endow the products with high-barrier qualities preventing contamination. But, while the additive makes the attractive plastic container air-tight, it also renders the trays non-recyclable.

Developed by MCP Performance Plastics at Kibbutz Hama'apil, the new trays — trademarked On-trays — are manufactured from a specially developed polyester that does not have to be laced with alcohol to remain air-tight, thus making the tray recyclable.

Passover Foods

How many ways can you prepare potatoes

If there's one thing we eat a lot of at Pesach, it's potatoes. Here are a few suggestions for making them with a gourmet touch.

HASH BROWN POTATO

4 medium boiled potatoes
2 tbsp. chopped onion
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
¼ cup oil

Shred potatoes to equal 4 cups. Heat oil in pan. Toss potatoes, onions, salt and pepper. Pack mixture into skillet and cook over low heat until crust forms on bottom, about 10-15 minutes. Cut into fourths. Turn and brown on second side. Add more oil if necessary. Serves 5

GOLDEN POTATOES

3-4 lb. pared potatoes
⅔ cup oil
2 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Cut potatoes into ¼ inch slices. Pour oil into shallow baking pan. Dip potato slices in oil so that both sides are coated. Layer slices in baking pan. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Bake at 450 degrees for 30 minutes or until golden brown. Drain and serve. Serves 8

FLAVORFUL NEW POTATOES

Simmer 12 small, whole new potatoes until done, about 15-20 minutes. Drain and return to heat. Add butter and sprinkle with 1 tsp. basil leaves and ½ tsp. chives. Makes 2-3 servings.

HOT POTATO APPLE SALAD

(Adopted from Foodland Ontario).
4 medium potatoes, peeled
1 medium onion, halved and sliced
1 cup sliced mushrooms (about 10 medium)
1 tbsp. oil
2 apples, cored and diced
⅓ cup Passover vinegar
2 tbsp. water
1 tbsp. sugar
½ tsp. dried marjoram leaves
⅛ tsp. pepper

Cook potatoes covered in 1 inch of boiling water until tender. Drain. Slice and place in large bowl. Saute onion and mushrooms in oil until barely softened, 2 to 3 minutes. Add to potato slices. Add apples to potato slices. In saucepan, mix vinegar, water, sugar, marjoram and pepper. Simmer 5 minutes. Pour over potato mixture and toss to combine all ingredients. Serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

The demise of a suicide bomber

Terrorist blew himself up prematurely

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Staff Sgt. Assi Danan described last week how he had confronted the suicide bomber who hurled himself at an IDF patrol inside the security zone, blowing himself up and killing Golani Brigade Capt. Salah Zeidan.

Danan was in the jeep with the driver and the commander of the region, when they saw a man standing by the road junction they were passing en route from Taibeh to the border crossing at Metulla.

"The man aroused our suspicion because he was walking so slowly. The driver received instructions from the brigade commander to stop the vehicle," said Danan.

"I looked out the rear window of the jeep and saw the man coming towards the jeep. I cocked my gun, on the orders of the commander in the jeep and he ordered the man to stop," said Danan.

"The man didn't respond to the call and made movements with his hands as if to say everything was okay. It seemed very suspicious to me and I got out of the vehicle and fired a shot in the air.

"When I shot, the terrorist blew himself up. There was a big mushroom of smoke and fire coming toward me and I jumped from the vehicle and took cover. For a while, we lost eye contact with the commander, but when the smoke cleared, we heard his voice and went toward him and then artillery fire was directed at us. The soldiers acted very well and took up positions and those who were supposed to, returned fire."

Danan said it appeared that the terrorist blew himself up prematurely as a result of the reaction of the soldiers, especially after the warning shot was fired. He noted that the suicide bomber was less than four metres from the jeep when he blew himself up.

Danan stressed that the troops had acted in accordance with regulations and had kept a safe distance. Asked if he thought he should have fired first and asked questions later, Danan said that in such a case, the terrorist might have hurled himself at the commander in an effort to kill them.

IDF Chief of Staff links training deaths to lack of discipline

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Lack of discipline and aptitude is the main reason for training accidents in the IDF, Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak said last Sunday.

Speaking at the National Defence College, Shahak said the IDF had reduced the number of accidents in 1995, compared to the previous year.

According to IDF figures, last year there were 515 accidents in the IDF, resulting in the deaths of 20 soldiers; in 1994, there were 533, with 25 fatalities. Of last year's 159 training accidents, seven resulted in deaths, five in the air force and one each in the navy and ground forces.

"There is a great improvement," Shahak said. "I think that 1995 was one of the best years regarding the scope of accidents and their treatment. But as long as we have injuries, not enough is being done."

Shahak handed out awards for the safest units. First place among regular units went to the air force, followed by the engineers. The Gaza Division won first place among operational field units and the Armored Corps School was awarded top place among training units. Military Intelligence won first place among support units.

Second son killed serving in IDF

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Golani company commander Cpt. Salah Zeidan, 23, of Beit Jann, was his parents' second son to fall in the line of duty. His brother Fuad was killed by a stray bullet in Bethlehem in 1987.

Salah Zeidan, a graduate of the Rama High School, completed a year's preparatory study at the Technion before being drafted. His father, Kamel, a police officer, said last Wednesday he had intended to study medicine after the army.

"We had planned for him to finish his compulsory service and go on to study, but he liked being an officer and signed on for the regular army," said his father. "He had no fears about serving in southern Lebanon and would always tell us not to worry."

Zeidan is survived by his parents, two sisters, and a younger brother who is about to be called up for military service.

Israel Election notebook

David Levy Gets Second Spot

JERUSALEM – The heads of the Likud, Tsomet and Gesher parties have signed an agreement to form a joint list in the upcoming Knesset elections.

As a result of the agreement, Prime Minister Shimon Peres will face only one opponent in the race for the premiership in Israel's May 29 national elections: Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

The agreement came less than a month after Likud maverick David Levy announced that he was forming a new party, Gesher – Hebrew for "bridge" – and that he would run for prime minister as party head.

Seeking The Russian Immigrant Vote

JERUSALEM – The two top contenders for the Israeli premiership did their best last week to woo supporters of a fledgling political party made up mainly of Russian immigrants.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of the opposition Likud party, appeared before the founding convention of the Yisrael b'Aliyah party, which was meeting to elect its slate for the May 29 Knesset elections.

Yisrael b'Aliyah Elects Party List

JERUSALEM – Yisrael b'Aliyah, the new immigrants party, held its founding convention in Jerusalem, electing its president, central committee and party list for the Knesset.

Close to 2,000 members of the movement-turned-party crammed into the International Convention Centre after each one had received at least 10 recommendations from movement members to be a delegate.

Almost all of the delegates hold academic degrees.

Third Way Elects Candidates

JERUSALEM – The Third Way council's 250 members elected the party's list of Knesset candidates at Ramat Efal on March 20.

Tension prevailed over the council meeting, which was otherwise orderly and dignified, when it was learned that a committee appointed by the council had made a list of 16 recommended candidates.

The list was kept strictly secret until just before the vote, and was given to each council member only at the polling booths. It was estimated that the council members would vote according to the list, since they are not familiar with all of the candidates, many of whom are unknown.

and after they left, he waited to see if everything was OK and the soldiers weren't missing anything."

In a press conference in Lebanon, Nasrallah revealed that the suicide bomber, Ali Mounis Ashmar, 20, came from Adeisseh village, near Taibeh, inside the security zone.

He said Ashmar had been recruited into the ranks of the suicide battalion some eight months ago.

Nasrallah said the suicide bomb attack proved the "many advances Hezbollah has made in monitoring the enemy's movements and collecting intelligence. Of course we are improving. Does [Prime Minister Shimon] Peres think we are primitives and Third World beings?" said Nasrallah.

He maintained that the lone suicide bomber attack was the first of its kind in the security zone. "This will force the Zionist enemy to adopt complicated and cumbersome countermeasures to protect their movements," said Nasrallah.

Nasrallah maintained that Hezbollah acted on its own and did not receive instructions from Teheran or Syria to either escalate or restrain its activities.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres said last week that the IDF will do "everything necessary, on the basis of operational considerations," in response to the recent wave of Hezbollah attacks in south Lebanon.

For the first time, the Iranian Embassy in Beirut also issued a statement last week warning Israel against any action against the embassy or Iranian interests in Lebanon.

"The embassy of the Republic of Iran holds the Zionist entity and its American protectors responsible in advance for any aggression against it or any other [Iranian] institution in Lebanon or anywhere else in the world," the statement said.

The announcement was seen as an attempt by the Iranians to head off accusations by Israel of Iranian involvement in the latest wave of Hezbollah attacks in south Lebanon, in which six IDF soldiers have been killed and over 20 wounded.

It was also seen as an indirect threat from Iran itself that it would respond if the IDF hits its bases in Lebanon, including training bases where Iranian Revolutionary guards are instructing Hezbollah terrorists.

Meanwhile, the situation in south Lebanon, in the security zone and along the northern border remained tense.

Closure still in effect

when he stated last week that the PNC will not convene to amend the charter until the closure is lifted.

Abourdena said that the PNC will definitely meet in April to discuss amending the charter, which the Israeli government wants changed because of the sections in it calling for Israel's destruction.

Asked about Salam's statement that the PNC would not meet until the closure is lifted, Abourdenah said, "Arafat did not say that. The political leadership is committed to the PNC meeting being held within two months of the Palestinian Council" election.

In a separate development last Sunday, Israel allowed a group of 200 Palestinian police to enter Gaza via the Rafah crossing from Egypt.

The group, which had arrived from Libya, had been waiting at the border for a month, after two wanted Palestinians were discovered trying to sneak in with them.

Meanwhile, Palestinian security officials released Fouad Nahhal, head of the new Islamic National Salvation party, who was arrested Saturday.

Congress examines Farrakhan's foreign travels

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – Louis Farrakhan's supporters descended on Washington again last week, this time to answer a congressional probe into the Nation of Islam leader's controversial foreign travels with their own show of force.

At a tense congressional hearing, lawmakers criticized Farrakhan for verbal attacks he made against the United States during his recent multination tour.

The criticism at the hearing prompted angry jeers from Farrakhan's backers in the audience. Two people were arrested and charged after being ejected for disrupting the proceedings.

The hearing came just days after black newspaper publishers honored Farrakhan as their Newsmaker of the Year, an honor which dismayed Jewish groups.

One of the four criteria for the award from the National Newspaper Publishers Association is the display of a "higher level of moral authority."

The Nation of Islam leader has come under fire for his recent tour of at least 18 countries. The tour included stopovers in Libya, Iran, Iraq and Sudan, which are countries that the U.S. government considers sponsors of international terrorism.

Christopher Smith, who chairs the House International Relations subcommittee on international operations and human rights, said the hearing was part of an ongoing attempt to investigate rogue regimes and their efforts to influence U.S. policy.

Foreign policy experts testified about the relationship between those nations and U.S. interests.

But the main focus was clearly on Farrakhan.

"It is self-evident that this hearing was called in response to a series of statements made by Louis Farrakhan to some of the most despicable, bloody dictatorships on the face of this planet," said Californian Tom Lantos.

Peter King, the Nation of Islam leader's most outspoken critic in Congress, said the trip was a "terror tour" and called Farrakhan "a vicious racist and hatemonger as well as a potential national security threat."

"When you combine a foreign dictator and a foreign tyrant such as [Libyan leader] Muammar Khadafi with a domestic racist such as Louis Farrakhan, that is dangerous to our nation," King said to coughs and jeers from the Farrakhan supporters.

In Tripoli, Khadafi reportedly pledged $1 billion to finance Farrakhan's political activities in the United States.

In Iran, a newspaper quoted Farrakhan as having labelled the United States the "Great Satan" and saying that "God will destroy America at the hands of Muslims."

The Justice and Treasury departments have both launched inquiries to determine whether he violated any laws during his trip.

Yom Ha'atzmaut Teen Cartoon Festival

We are asking all teenagers to turn on their creative juices and submit to us cartoons dealing with the subject of Israel. In particular, we are looking for cartoons which have both artistic and intellectual merit. They may be funny, serious, satiric or cute. We are looking for cartoons which poignantly and tastefully convey one of the many truths about life in Israel.

Who can enter: All teenagers are eligible except the children of CJN employees.

How to enter: You may submit as many entries as you like.

The judges will choose cartoons which are well-illustrated, clever and tasteful.

Six cartoons will be selected as winners: three cartoons from contestants 15 years of age and younger, and three cartoons from contestants 16 to 19 years of age inclusive.

The cartoons must be drawn in black and white. This will ensure that the cartoon reproduces as well as possible.

Please write your name, age, address and phone number on the back of your submission.

You may mail or deliver your submission to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont., M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the cartoon, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on April 15, 1996.

Prizes: The "winning" cartoons will be published in The CJN Yom Ha'atzmaut issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a $50.00 cheque.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only six will be chosen for publication. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: The contestants whose cartoons are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, April 19, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning submissions will be published in The CJN of April 25, 1996.

We hope the contest generates original, witty, imaginative and possibly even inspiring thought. We look forward to receiving your entries.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

More and more
multinationals are looking for international MBAs with managerial insight into the New Middle East

In today's marketplace you need a distinct competitive advantage in order to forge ahead. A mere MBA may not suffice. An International MBA from a prestigious school in one of the world's fastest growing regions - the New Middle East - can be your cutting edge.

- A distinguished faculty, carefully selected from leading universities around the world, under guidance of an eminent international academic committee

Sales Rentals Syndications Consultancy Management Re-Appraisal

'Capital of terror' funds extremists

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

It was a conspicuous failure, one that Iran surely relished.

At the anti-terrorism summit in Sharm El-Sheik on March 13, called in response to the spate of suicide bombings in Israel in February and March, Prime Minister Shimon Peres of Israel tried, but failed, to convince the participants to single out Iran as "the capital of terror."

Among 29 nations present, only the United States and Britain supported Israel's call to isolate Iran, which contemptuously dismissed the hastily-convened conference as a tool of Washington and "the Zionists."

Observers were not unduly surprised by the generally tepid response to Israel's recommendation. Iran, with enormous oil and gas reserves and a market that exporters and investors covet, is a country few nations wish to alienate.

Late last year, for example, almost 100 European and Asian executives travelled to Tehran to discuss Iran's latest investment opportunity, a package of 11 oil and gas development deals valued at $6 billion.

Companies from the United States, which once enjoyed a privileged position in Iran, were forbidden to send representatives to Tehran. In May 1995, Washington imposed an embargo on all forms of trade with Iran, and last December, the U.S. Senate passed a bill which penalizes foreign firms from doing business with Tehran.

Mideast Analysis

Iranian link

Washington's antagonism toward Iran, shared by Israel, stems from a variety of circumstances. The United States was not pleased by the fall of the pro-Western Iranian monarchy and its replacement by a hostile Islamic fundamentalist regime in 1979.

The new Iranian government, led by Ayatollah Ruhallah Khomeini, threatened to export Islamic fundamentalism to its Arab neighbors and tolerated the takeover of the U.S. embassy in Tehran, which resulted in a complete breakdown of relations with the United States.

During this period, Iran also severed its ties with Israel. From that point onward, Iran joined the rejectionist camp in the Arab and Islamic world.

Iran's relationship with the United States deteriorated still further when Washington tactitly backed Baghdad during the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War.

In May 1993, after years of mutual estrangement, the United States enunciated a doctrine of "dual containment" toward Iran (and Iraq). The policy was unveiled by Martin Indyk, the Clinton administration's chief Middle East advisor and at present the U.S. ambassador to Israel.

In essence, dual containment is designed to weaken Iran and Iraq, the main destabilizing forces in the Middle East today.

Iran, which finds itself on a U.S. list of states supporting terrorism, has funnelled significant sums of money to Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and Ahmad Jibril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine-General Command.

Iran is remarkably candid about its attitude toward Israel, the Oslo peace process and terrorism. Tehran denounces Israel's right to exist, rejects Israel's growing rapprochement with the Palestinians and with various Arab nations, and glorifies suicide bombings.

Responding to the carnage in Jerusalem on March 3 and in Tel Aviv on March 4, Iran's official news agency described them as "divine retribution" heralding "the beginning of the end of Israel." (Yasser Arafat, head of the Palestinian Authority, has accused Iran of being behind the latest suicide bombings).

The United States has made it clear that it will relax its economic sanctions against Iran only when Tehran ends its opposition to the Arab-Israeli peace process, drops its support for terrorism and halts its efforts to develop a nuclear capability.

According to U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, Iran "is engaged in a crash effort" to build a nuclear arsenal.

In a bid to squelch its ambitions, the United States has urged Iran's chief trading partners — Germany, Russia, China and Japan — not to sell nuclear reactors or vital technology to Iran. And in another step to keep Iran from building nuclear weapons and financing its ongoing military buildup, the United States has asked Western nations to stop providing Iran with credits.

Washington's overtures have fallen on deaf ears. No country, including Canada, has joined the American embargo of Iran, and thus the sanctions, which Iran has largely been able to circumvent, have caused relatively little pain in Tehran. What is more, Western countries continue to provide Iran with generous credits under their policy of "critical dialogue" with Tehran.

No wonder Iran did not take the anti-terrorism summit in Sharm El Sheik too seriously.

The Week in Israel

March 18

• Kol Yisrael reported that the Israeli economy grew by seven percent in 1995. This was the same rate of growth as the previous year. Exports of goods and services rose by 10 percent. Work productivity rose by one percent and the standard of living rose by five percent.

March 19

• Ma'ariv reported that Dr. Eran Shenkar, the leading candidate to become the first Israeli in space, completed an advanced stage of training at NASA's space centre in Houston, where he is undergoing training with five American doctors.

March 20

• Ma'ariv reported that Tunisia would open an interest office in Tel Aviv today. The Israeli interest office in Tunis is scheduled to open in two weeks. Both missions will be located initially in hotels and then moved to permanent locations.

March 21

• Ha'aretz reported that for the first time since his arrest and conviction in 1985, Jonathan Pollard was scheduled to be visited, on March 24, by an official representative of the Israeli government.

• Davar Rishon reported that Ireland announced plans to open an embassy in Israel. Stating that it hoped the embassy would assist in strengthening relations between the two countries, the government of Ireland sent a request to Israel seeking official approval of the opening.

March 22

• Eleven senior police officials from Atlanta, Ga., arrived in Israel for a fact-finding and training mission on ways to detect and prevent terrorism. The security officers were in Israel as part of the security apparatus preparations for the upcoming Summer Olympics.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• Seven hundred people were expected in Jerusalem to attend two conferences this week: The 12th International Symposium on Sport Injuries and The International Conference on Psychodrama.

Right wing show of unity could boomerang in election

By SUSAN HATTIS ROLEF
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The image that will remain from the spectacle the Likud staged last week at its central committee meeting will be of Benny Begin standing alone in a raucous crowd holding up his yellow card in a vote against the Likud-Gesher-Tsomet merger.

Commentary

A little earlier, Begin had used the rhetorical talents inherited from his father to mock David Levy's "principles" and movement and attack the merger.

Begin was apparently the only Likud member standing for election in this week's primaries with the guts to spoil Benjamin Netanyahu's public demonstration of "unity." Several others known to agree with him kept silent. The few rank and file members who dared join him were jeered by the crowd.

It wasn't democracy at its best, but when the end justifies the means, who cares about democracy? The goal, as we all know, is to send Labor and its partners back into opposition and halt the Oslo process.

But last week's show left a bitter taste, even among the right-wing camp, and it is more likely than not to boomerang.

Despite what some polls have indicated, the new alignment is likely to receive fewer seats in the 14th Knesset than it would were the three parties to run separately.

Why? First, because many Tsomet voters in the last elections were either Labor-oriented hawks who found Labor's positions and list too dovish, or young people attracted by Tsomet's stand on human rights and clean government, and against religious coercion.

None of these are likely Likud voters and while the former might now vote for the Third Way, the latter could opt for Meretz.

Secondly, many of Gesher's potential voters are now likely to vote for Shas on ethnic grounds, while those foolish enough to take Levy's social platform seriously will probably look elsewhere.

The whole exercise has left the Likud's image badly tarnished.

Netanyahu paid an exhorbitant price for the merger. Many devoted Likudniks who had hoped for realistic places on the Likud list will now be left off it.

Women to lose places on list

The alignment is expected to win at least 44 or 45 seats, but if we take the 36 seats today commanded by the Likud, Tsomet and Gesher, 29 belonging to the Likud, five to Tsomet and two to Gesher, then of the 45 projected seats, 36 ought to be reserved for Likud members and not 31 as agreed.

But even this calculation is faulty. If the Likud ran on its own without Tsomet and Gesher, it would most probably gain more than 36 seats; thus the number of Likudniks left out will be greater than five.

One group that will lose are women. The Likud women, whose two current Knesset representatives, Limor Livnat and Naomi Blumental, are both first-class parliamentarians, had originally managed to reserve four slots for women up to the 40th place. They are now unlikely to get even three out of 31. And since neither Tsomet nor Gesher has a woman in a realistic place, the alignment will probably end up represented by only two women, compared to Labor's reserved six.

But the Likud hasn't just suffered in terms of representation. It has also paid a high price as regards image. Netanyahu has shown himself a poor bargainer, the last thing Israel needs just now. And his number two, David Levy, might have made the deal of his life but to the public, including most Likudniks, he now represents cynical politics at its worst and a total lack of credibility to boot.

Numbers three and four, Rafael Eitan and Ariel Sharon, "heroes" of the 1982 Lebanon war, will both be celebrating their 70th birthdays in the course of the 14th Knesset. The "princes" have been left behind sulking, and the likelihood of new faces entering the Likud list now look slim.

Finally, there was Benny Begin last week, calling out like the little boy in the fairy tale: "The emperor has no clothes!" Only this isn't a fairy tale, and the naked emperor could end up Israel's next prime minister.

Einstein document donated

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Albert Einstein's earliest manuscript on the Theory of Relativity has been donated to the Israel Museum in Jerusalem by the Jacob Safra Foundation.

The autographed manuscript was sold privately for an undisclosed sum by Sotheby's auction house in New York. Sotheby's described it as one of the most important extant scientific manuscripts, a museum spokesperson said.

The manuscript, dated 1912, consists of 72 pages, on which Einstein made several corrections. Since Einstein is known to have destroyed most of his manuscripts, the document is extremely rare, the spokesperson said. It is Einstein's longest and most comprehensive exposition on his relativity theory.

The document came to light in 1987, when a private owner sold it for $1.2 million to an anonymous buyer. It was again offered for sale last week and bids went as high as $3.3 million, but failed to meet the owner's $4 million minimum. It was then put on block.

"This is totally unexpected, but it is the greatest gift that any institution could get," former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, chairman of the museum's board, said last week. "I cannot find words to express my gratitude to the Safra family."

Museum director Martin Weyl described the manuscript as "a precious and historic document that will be a most welcome and proud addition to our museum collection."

The Hebrew University, which owns Einstein's personal archives, has a shorter version of the manuscript on relativity, this one dated 1916.

Creating a healthier home environment

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For most people, home is a place of refuge, a safe place to relax, unwind and recharge your batteries.

Unfortunately, your place of refuge may also be home to a chemical soup that could be making you sick.

With the rise of fuel prices in the mid-1970s and with energy conservation a major concern, we built tightly sealed homes in which household chemicals and biological contaminants float through the air and have nowhere to go, said Danita Aziza, a self-taught authority on healthy homes.

The result of those changes is home pollution levels that rival those of some major cities and a growing awareness among researchers that many chronic illnesses are exacerbated, if not caused, by poor indoor air quality, she said.

Irritated eyes, nose and throat, headaches, dizziness, fatigue and other ailments are some of the results.

A 1980s study conducted by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency found the concentration of 11 chemicals was two to five times greater indoors than outside.

There are numerous trace chemicals floating in the air, the most common being formaldehyde, Aziza said. Formaldehyde is commonly found in paper towels, particle board and other pressed wood products, synthetic carpets, some plastics, cosmetics and even bed linen.

Volatile Organic Compounds, a "chemical soup," are emitted from paints, cleaning supplies, caulking compounds, new carpets and floor coverings, drywall and some plastics, she said.

These can get into the air and linger, moving from room to room and attaching themselves to carpets where they remain for some time, she said.

Mould, whose growth is enhanced by moisture, release disease-causing toxins that can create allergic reactions; carpets, particularly the wall-to-wall variety, can serve as a reservoir for chemicals, moulds, smoke (from cigarettes), dust mites and other substances that affect people's health.

Fortunately, there are steps that can be taken to alleviate the problem. Some require some planning, others are as low-tech as simply opening windows, Aziza said.

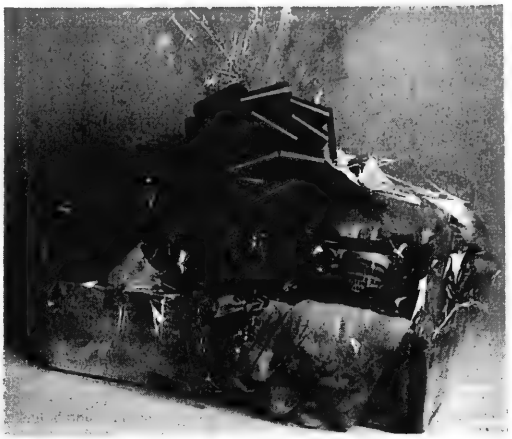
"People should open their windows every day. It's the best way to flush chemicals outside the home," she said.

Aziza recommends obtaining carbon monoxide detectors, to warn against the colorless, odorless gas created in the combustion of natural gas.

Another measure Aziza is touting is the acquisition of a kit containing natural and non-toxic products to replace more conventional housewares. Aziza's company, Healthy Home Services, markets the kit as a gift box in several sizes.

The kit contains cleaning products by Nature Clean, renovation materials and accessories that are environmentally safe and hypoallergenic.

Among the products are a kitchen spray cleaner, laundry powder, bleach, borax, window cleaner, environmentally-safe sponges, a non-toxic caulking compound, natural soap and a spot remover.



The Healthy Home Gift Box contains natural and non-toxic products designed to reduce indoor air pollution.

There's also an Enviro-Dial from the Ontario Waste Management Corporation that contains recommended alternatives to commonly used household products.

Aziza's interest in creating a healthier home environment began three years ago after she and her husband Michel purchased and renovated a home.

After they moved in, she began to develop various ailments that included dizziness, congestion, a loss of appetite and a lack of sleep.

She visited a dozen doctors whose diagnoses ranged from serious ailments to psychological stress. She even visited the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., but, wouldn't you know it, her health improved when she went to be examined.

After another bout with her non-specific ailments back home, "a friend of my mother-in-law suggested it was a reaction to the renovations."

Their wood floor had been sanded and urethaned, new tiles and some broadloom had been laid down, a new kitchen counter had been installed and the place had been painted.

After some study, it turned out an oil-based paint was the source of her grief. Their solution was to "bake the house." The windows were opened and the thermostat set to just under 85 degrees farenheit so that the heat and ventilation released the chemicals and vented them out, Aziza said.

In addition, a special sealent was used on all the oil-based surfaces and the new surfaces were cleaned, bringing down the chemical level to an insignificant level.

"When this happened to me three years ago, nobody had heard of it. Today, people are really starting to become more conscious of it," she said.

Improving residential air quality is a booming business in the United States, while in Canada, there are services that will test the quality of your home's air, she added.

Here are some healthy home tips, recommended by Aziza:

- Have your heating and air conditioning systems serviced every year.
- Clean your humidifier regularly.
- Store toxic cleaning products, paints and other chemicals in a separate, ventilated space like a garage or garden shed.
- Use non-toxic cleaning products.
- Avoid solvents and aerosols.
- Minimize use of conventional fabric softeners.
- Minimize exposure to conventional pesticides.

The Ontario Waste Management Corporation's Enviro-Dial suggests alternatives to commonly used household products. Among them:

- Instead of using a drain cleaner, use a plunger or a metal snake; or, pour 125 ml baking soda followed by 125 ml of vinegar into the drain and cover with a stopper.
- Instead of using floor stain remover, mop floor with full strength vinegar, let stand for half an hour and wipe with a damp cloth.
- Instead of using scouring powders, sprinkle baking soda and scour, then rinse; or, shake salt on surface, scour with cloth dipped in lemon juice, then wipe clean with damp cloth.

IGTO event draws Arab nations

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – For the first time, representatives of tourism authorities from two Arab countries – Jordan and Tunisia – attended events here and in Montreal hosted earlier this month by the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada (IGTO).

The presence of Jordanian and Tunisian tourism officials at the IGTO events on March 13 and 14 signals the willingness of an increasing number of Arab countries to recognize the lucrative potential of joint tourism initiatives with Israel.

The IGTO's combined travel trade show and dinner attracted at least 400 travel professionals in each city. At both functions, IGTO director Ruth Ben-Tzur spoke proudly of the increasing flow of Canadian travellers to Israel – there were 52,000 in 1995, a 25 percent rise over 1994 – and said that Canadians are still travelling in record numbers to Israel, despite the recent terrorist bombings.

"Some tragic events happened in Israel in the last few weeks," she said at the Toronto meeting. "But did the tourists leave Israel? Definitely not. More than 200,000 tourists are still visiting Israel each month. When I speak to my office, they say the streets and cafes and hotels are still full of people."

Israelis and Palestinians will continue together down the road to peace despite the terrorists, Ben-Tzur said.

"Terrorism is dangerous for everybody, whether it occurs in Tokyo, London, Oklahoma or Paris," she said. "This road we've started down with our Arab neighbors leads only in one direction: to peace."

Ihsan Naghaway, a representative of Royal Jordanian Airlines who attended the IGTO event, told The CJN the number of Canadians his airline carries to Amman and points beyond has increased dramatically since the recent peace accord and open borders with Israel.

"In Jordan, we believe peace is inevitable and that the process will continue. It will never stop," he said.

Naghaway said both Royal Jordanian and Israel El Al airlines will begin regular service between Tel Aviv and Amman in April.

"Very soon, they will allow private cars to be driven between Jordan and Israel,"he said.

Joanne Cothran, group travel representative for Regent Holidays, said she had been in Israel escorting a group of 12 Christian clergy from Ontario when Hamas began its dirty work.

"Usually on such a tour, participants are interested in their own spirituality. This time, they were concerned with the people, praying for the families and for peace in Israel. The bombings did not dampen any part of the tour whatsoever," she said.

"Two more groups left with Regent on Monday, and not one person cancelled," she added.

Gritty film examines racial hatred

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

An Arab teenager is viciously beaten by the police. A riot erupts. A new cycle of violence is unleashed.

No, this is not the West Bank, but Paris, the setting of Mathieu Kassovitz's searing movie, Hate, now playing at the Cumberland theatre.

Hate, which left a favorable impression at last year's Cannes Film Festival, turns on three young men — a Jew, an Arab and an African — and their reaction to the latest case of police brutality.

All three live in the projects, the drab neighborhoods just outside Paris where resentment of authority is the golden rule.

Vinz (Vincent Cassel), the Jew, seethes with anger. When a loaded police revolver falls into his hands, he is sorely tempted to use it.

Hubert (Hubert Kounde), the African, is more restrained. But he, too, can hardly contain his rage.

Said (Said Taghmaoui), the Arab, teeters on the fence, bitter at the police, to be sure, but wise enough to keep his cool.

Hate unfolds over a 24-hour period in the immediate aftermath of the riots, as Vinz, Hubert and Said roam the city and let off a head of steam.

The film, which focuses on the interlocking themes of troubled and disenfranchised youth and racial hatred, is made in black and white and in a gritty realistic style.

The language, colloquial, irreverent and profane, reminds one of black or Hispanic gang cultures in the United States.

In a film where racist skinheads lurk behind dark corners, waiting to pounce on their hapless victims, there is delicious irony in the fact that the main protagonists — Vinz, Hubert and Said — are bound in a bond of unlikely brotherhood.

Unrelievedly corrosive, Hate offers neither redemption nor hope. Kassovitz calls a spade and spade and lets the cards fall where they may.

Interactive Haggadah fun

By LESLIE KINRYS
CJN Staff

TORONTO – If you're like me, you're quite tired of all those Passover chores. So, let's take a break with our kids and instead have some fun preparing for Passover, with The Interactive Haggadah.

The Interactive Haggadah, a CD-ROM operating under Windows, comes from the creators of The Animated Haggadah book and video. Your computer allows you to enter the world of these colorful clay animated characters with a click of your mouse.

Join the family in English, Hebrew or Russian at their seder table. Click on anyone or anything and see what happens.

But don't stop there. Everything can be clicked on more than once, for added adventures. Be prepared to wait your turn. My family wouldn't let me on until they checked out everything.

My kids' favorites were the jukebox and the clock. Click on Grandmother to get the jukebox of seder songs. Try to name that holiday tune (there are three levels of difficulty). Click on the grandfather clock for time travel to ancient Egypt. Follow the signpost for a stroll along the Nile. You'll hear Moses crying in his basket, while Miriam tells him to hush.

My husband was impressed by the information found within the seder table's haggadah. It includes being able to hear and read the full text of the service with explanations and commentaries.

As usual, I ended up in the kitchen. Check out the cookbooks on the shelf and find some holiday recipes. Also, watch out! If you try to open the chometz cupboard, it will scold you.

For the whole family, there are games, quizzes and puzzles to solve.

The Interactive Haggadah retails for $69.95 at Israel's Judaica stores.

The Centaur and The Chanteuse: As Theresa Tova rehearses for From Belz to Broadway, the concert she is headlining March 31 at Toronto's New Yorker Theatre, she is also gearing up for a dramatic role in a play at Montreal's historic Centaur Theatre.

Rehearsals start in mid-April for The Freedman Family Fortune, by Montreal playwright-actor David Gow. According to Tova, the story concerns a large monied family in Montreal that is loosely based on the Bronfmans or the Steinbergs.

The cast also includes actors Joan Orenstein, Maurice Podbrey and Andrew Ackman. The play opens mid-May and runs to mid-June.

Tova expects to perform some concerts around town while she is in Montreal. As well, she is scheduled to perform a Yiddish concert April 14 at the Capital Theatre in Windsor.

Tickets are still available for the New Yorker concert, which takes place March 31 at 8 p.m. The evening is presented as a benefit to support the development of Tova's Still The Night, a new work of musical theatre. For tickets, call 416-537-6066 or 416-789-5100.

Did You Know?: Echad Mi Yode'ah? (Who Knows One?) is featured in the Haggadah of the Ashkenazi tradition as one of the concluding songs of the Passover seder. The song consists of 13 stanzas, each made up of questions and their corresponding answers, with all previous sets of questions and answers repeated with each successive refrain.

"Who knows 13? I know 13. Thirteen are the attributes of God; 12 the tribes of Israel; 11 the stars (in Joseph's dream); 10 the commandments; nine the months of pregnancy; eight the days of circumcision; seven the days of the week; six the books of the Mishnah; five the books of the Torah; four the matriarchs (Sarah, Rebeccah, Leah, Rachel); three the patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob); two the tablets of the Covenant; One is our God in heaven and on earth."

According to the Encyclopedia Judaica, the purpose of the song was "to keep the children awake" until the end of the seder."

Echad Mi Yode'ah? first appeared in print in Ashkenazi Haggadot of the 16th century. Folklorists have noted its similarity to a popular German pastoral song, with which it shares a line of lyrics. According to 19th-century Judaic scholar Leopold Zunz, the song was sung in Avignon on a variety of festive occasions. Variations have been found in Jewish liturgical music in Ceylon and Cochin, as well as in Greek and English church songs, and Scottish nursery songs.

Strong plot and crackling script makes Dangerous Liaisons a crowd pleaser

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — People who enjoy a play which proceeds logically from one turn in the plot to another, and is full of crackling dialogue, will find Sam Rosenthal's direction of Dangerous Liaisons to their liking.

The action takes place in prerevolutionary France in this drama by Tribal Productions running until March 31 at Theatre Centre East, 142 George Street, 538-0988.

The brilliant costumes and ensemble scenes are highlights, along with the skilful characterizations of the co-conspirator by Lisa Horner, and of the woman who proves to be the villain's downfall by Sara Dickinson.

Unfortunately, Eli Lukawitz doesn't bring enough menace to the role of the villain to be credible. The audience is too swayed by his arguments to consider him anything but a nice guy being misjudged.

Melany Eli, a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, has a minor role as a housemaid. Danny Webber is the producer.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Cairo Diary: Bartering is a way of life in this bustling, dirty, exotic city of 15 million people. From the moment you arrive, you will be beseeched and cajoled to buy perfume, eat a shishkebab, hire a taxi, or purchase an antique papyrus of dubious provenance. You cannot walk far without someone saying, "Hello – are you American?" and perhaps walking alongside you, asking, "Where are you staying? At the Semiramis? Nile Hilton?" and "What would you like to buy?"

The streets are overgrown donkey paths, ill-equipped for the motor traffic that now clogs them. Few intersections have traffic lights. Cars honk continuously. Not even the white-uniformed traffic police can tame the disorderly stream of vehicles that includes donkey carts, horse-drawn buggies, even pickup trucks loaded with livestock.

The sights, smells and sounds are overwhelming. Here, a man is polishing a car; a boy is beating a donkey; three men in caftans are sitting at a cafe, drinking Turkish coffee and smoking a hookah; a girl, barefoot and in rags, plays with a dog; a veiled woman reclines on a pile of straw. The nostrils are filled with incense, dung, perfume, smog, fresh-baked bread, dust from the desert. The calls of children, muezzins and wild geese reverberate in the air.

In a bazaar by the Nile, street after narrow street is filled with a diverse assortment of apothecaries, bakeries, cafes, furniture makers, rug weavers and merchants of aluminum kitchen utensils, colorful fabrics, cassette tapes, leatherbound Korans. Behind pushcart and scales, an elderly woman takes the hen she has been weighing, sips some water and bites the live chicken mortally through the neck.

En route, by foot, to the Egyptian Museum: "Hello, mister, you need a taxi? I take you all around Cairo – the pyramids, the Citadel Mosque, Old Cairo, the old synagogue, the old Coptic church. Everything."

"No thank you. I'm just going to the museum."

"Ah, well then, perhaps later? I will wait for you."

"No thank you. That won't be necessary. Salaam al komen."

Relics of ancient dynasties

The Egyptian Museum is a wonderful 19th-century building of classical proportions with a massive collection of sarcophagi, mummies, obelisks, statues and other relics of ancient dynasties. After two hours, my usual limit, I emerge into the daylight, wondering what to do next.

"Hello, mister! I wait for you! Now I take you to pyramids, okay?"

"No thank you. I've already seen them."

"To the Citadel Mosque and Old Cairo I will take you. I show you everything. You will be very happy or you give me nothing. Okay?"

The negotiation for the two-hour hire starts near $50 (US), which we both agree is a ridiculous figure, and ends at about 20 Egyptian pounds, or about $10 – "plus baksheesh." Our first stop is the Citadel Mosque of Mohammed Ali, a spectacular piece of architecture with a commanding view of the whole megalopolis, including the Sphinx and the three pyramids on the desert's edge.

To reach the 800-year-old Ben Ezra synagogue involves passing through Old Cairo, where the squalor is overwhelming. The roads are no more than dirt tracks, the houses stone hovels with corrugated iron rooves. From the taxi, one peers into the City of the Dead, a centuries-old cemetery whose tombs double as residences for the poor.

"Mister, are you Jewish?"

The venerable old synagogue is plain, dusty, under constant repair. For centuries, its attic genizah was the burial place for more than 100,000 discarded Hebrew texts, letters and other documents. The genizah, rediscovered in the 19th century, has yielded a wealth of knowledge. (Prominent in medieval times when Maimonides lived here, Cairo's Jewish community has all but disappeared.)

My first visit to the pyramids was at night; like the views, the sound and light show was disappointing. So on my last full day in Cairo, I return to the pyramids. Now the taxi rolls right up to them in daylight and their grandeur becomes at once apparent. Then we go further into the desert and look back at them with the sprawling, smoggy city as a backdrop.

For three Egyptian pounds I buy entry into a pyramid. An old man leads me, crouching and backwards, down a narrow sloping tunnel deep into the monument's heart. Eventually we enter a chamber with a stone sarcophagus inside and flecks of ancient paint on the wall. Back in the Egyptian air, I give my self-appointed guide the expected baksheesh and buy my waiting driver a Turkish coffee at a cafe beside the quixotic Sphinx.

Although many of Egypt's famous monuments were ancient even in the days of Jacob, some historians conjecture that Jewish slaves helped construct them. It's a fertile irony that we who were once slaves in Egypt may now return as tourists, dispensing baksheesh as we go. For information on travel in Egypt, contact the Egyptian Tourist Authority in Montreal, 514-861- 4420.

Toronto trio trying to form a Jewish triathlon club

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ever felt you were on a treadmill, walking or running but not getting anywhere?

Oh, the cardio can be pretty good as the "Ks" add up, but boy can it get boring doing the same routine over and over again.

Howard Esakov has what he believes is an appealing alternative for like-minded athletes who don't mind a challenge — training for triathlons.

Esakov is a triple-threat sportsman who's starting a club for other budding Jewish triathletes. He and his friends Randy Richmond and Michael Cohen are devotees of the sport, seeking to turn on other weekend (and weekday) warriors to the joys and benefits of running, swimming and biking your way to a healthier future.

Plywood Man

The proposed club, which has no name as yet, will bring athletes together to train, to create camaraderie and social bonds, to promote the sport and to permit the group to enter events as a team, he said.

While triathlons may be best known for the Iron Man variety — where athletes run 42 kilometres, swim four kilometres and bicycle 180 kilometres, in anywhere from eight to 14 hours — he and his friends practise a gentler brand of the sport. More Plywood Man than Iron Man, they compete in events that generally entail eight to 10-K runs, 25- to 30-K bike rides and 750-metre swims.

They've got their eyes set on several summertime events in Barrie, Collingwood, Orillia and King City and they've already begun pounding the pavement and doing laps in preparation for the competition, Esakov said.

Three times a week, they get together at a mid-Toronto pool for early morning laps. Then, for one night a week, they hit the track at York University for eight Ks of interval training (high intensity runs followed by a brief rest followed by more running, etc.). Finally, twice a week, they ride stationary bikes at a sports club, though with the weather changing, outdoor rides are getting on the itinerary.

Esakov says participation in triathlons is growing as "people are getting sick and tired of one-dimensional sports. They want variety."

The new club will be open to men and women of all levels of achievement, with cost set at $25. Members will receive a T-shirt, a training schedule and the encouragement of working out in a group environment, he said.

For more information, Esakov can be reached at 905-731-4433.

WE'RE NUMBER ONE

Sporting big smiles, the boys from USDS Bayview celebrate victory in the first-ever Jewish day school hockey tournament over teams from Bialik, USDS Bathurst and Associated North. Junior gymnast finishes first

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Justin Gerson continues to vault up the gymnastics ladder.

The 18-year-old Toronto-area athlete finished first overall in the Elite Canada gymnastics competition in Montreal recently, bettering the efforts of Canada's top 27 junior gymnasts.

The first place finish comes on the heels of a third place result at the Union of West Vienna Cup late last year.

For Gerson, the Montreal meet produced his best showing yet in a major event and included a victory over number 1 seed Ben Potvin of Ottawa. Potvin came in second at the Canadian nationals last year.

Potvin led in scoring after Day 1 with Gerson close behind, but Day 2 was a different story, as Gerson continued his solid performance while Potvin faltered.

Potvin finished fourth, while Gerson edged out his nearest competitor by a cumulative score of 100.35 to 99.85. The half point difference is the equivalent of a deduction for a fall, Gerson said.

A second in rings and a third in parallel bars were Gerson's best scores. Other events included pommel horse, floor exercises, vault and high bar.

"I felt really good," Gerson said. "The month before, my training was really good. I was hitting the [routines] in practice and I hit them in the competition."

Except for a fall on Day 1, Gerson was nearly flawless.

"I was trying a new move on the high bar, a release move. I let go of the bar and catch it and then repeat it, except I missed the second catch," he said rather matter-of-factly.

The results of the Elite Canada competition count for 30 percent of marks needed to make the national team. The other 70 percent will be determined by the results at the Nationals in Sault Ste. Marie in May.

A strong showing in the Soo — top eight, Gerson believes — should place him among the four highest-ranked members of the junior team and will likely mean a ticket to the Junior Pan Am Games in Guatemala in August.

Dear Lisa,

This spring I will be graduating and I haven't seen any job advertisements related to my experience. Where else can I look besides the newspapers? What should I do?

Dear Reader,

Continue to read the newspapers, but expand your reading to include more than just major papers. In addition, job listings in the newspapers are slim so don't count on seeing something there.

Visit the employment centre at your campus. The people there can help with resume preparation, job search tips and work placement opportunities. Often graduates of your school who are now working will place their company's job advertisments at their campus employment centre.

Find out if there is an association in the career area you want to enter. If you can't find one, check the Directory of Associates in Canada. Some associations advertise job postings in their newsletters; all of them offer opportunites to meet people.

Volunteer in an organization that will let you practice what you have learned. This will give you experience you can place on your resume and may lead to a work opportunity in the organization where you have been volunteering.

Speak to your teachers and see if they know of any work opportunities. If they don't know about any openings, ask them if they can recommend two people to talk to about work opportunities.

Go to the library and research companies in your area of interest. To find these employers look in directories such as Scott's Industrial Directory, Canadian Key Business Directory, Dunn & Bradstreet's Directory, Fraser's Canadian Trade Index, The Blue Book (list of social service agencies) and Canadian Advertising Rates and Data (list of advertisers and advertising agencies). Many other directories can be found with the help of your librarian. When you research, look for a contact whom you could speak to about the company, the industry and your hopes for employment.

Ask for a brief meeting and show that person a copy of your resume. A question about job opportunities within that company can also be part of the discussion.

Begin to read trade magazines, journals and publications related to your field. Keep your eyes open for companies who are doing well. Industries currently in the growth mode include technology, environmental services, communication and media relations and anything related to aging.

When you contact a potential employer be polite, professional and prepared. Have a few questions ready. Know a little bit about the company you are contacting. Show some focus regarding your career, but be open to suggestions. Listen closely and don't interrupt.

If every day you speak to 10 people who are in a hiring position, you should find a job within three months. It's finding these people that takes the effort.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Gulet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

APRICOT MOUSSE

A WONDERFUL FINISH TO YOUR SEDER MEAL

1 cup dried apricots
2 cups water
1 cup sugar or honey
3 tblsp lemon juice
2 tblsp Passover Triple Sec
4 egg whites

Bring apricots and water to a boil, lower heat and simmer until soft (about 15-20 mins.). Reserve water. In a food processor or blender, purée apricots, 4 tblsps cooking liquid, sugar or honey, lemon juice, Triple Sec. Beat egg whites until stiff, but not dry. Fold into apricot mixture. Chill. If desired, garnish with chocolate dipped apricots. Serves 6 to 8.

Shaliach ties two communities

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — A former Soviet Refusenik who was able to escape to Israel long before the Soviet Union broke up, is bringing the message of her new homeland to British Columbia communities.

Orit Katzov, the United Israel Appeal (UIA) shaliach to the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, has spent the last three years here "trying to get Vancouver Jews closer to Israel."

Katzov, born in Kiev, managed to make it to Israel in 1973, after more than a year of agitating to emigrate and taking part in a hunger strike with a group of other Jews, including her husband Alex — a protest which attracted attention around the world.

"Protesting in the Soviet was something you didn't do easily," Katzov told The CJN. Nevertheless, she and 15 others took the risk and succeeded in due course.

She had completed three years of a BA at Kiev State University but was expelled when it became known she wanted to emigrate to Israel. She was also fired from her job as an information officer with the Kiev Ministry of Communications.

Her family had observed Judaism "to a degree," she said, "and I always felt that I was Jewish and should be in Israel."

Katzov earned a teaching diploma and a BA in English and Russian studies at Hebrew University. That, plus a bubbling personality, won her a job with the Israeli Ministry of Tourism. Then she was transferred to South Africa, where she earned a diploma in public relations at Damelin College in Johannesburg, and she mastered the mysteries of the computer. Meanwhile she served Israel as emissary to students for the South African Zionist Federation.

Then it was back to Israel to become director of the Jerusalem office of the Israel Public Council for Soviet Jewry, a position she held for six years until the Jewish Agency sent her to Vancouver in 1982 or 1992.

Her public relations and administrative experience has been used during special assignments with the Jewish Agency: a freedom flight to help bring Jews out of the Soviet via Hungary; face-to-face canvassing for UJA in South Africa; a tour to the Soviet Union with a UIA Canada group; Operation Exodus fundraising in Australia; speaking assignments in Toronto and Calgary; and other tasks.

In British Columbia she is available to help all Israel-based organizations. If it's an Israel meeting or social, you can be sure Katzov is there talking up Israel. She lends a hand with the Jewish National Fund Negev Dinners in Vancouver, Victoria and Kelowna, and, as she put it, "I try to explain the challenges and realities of Israel today. I work hard to promote a lasting partnership between Israel and Canada, and especially encourage young people to visit Israel and think seriously about aliyah."

Jewish continuity, she said, is important to her "and I can't see fostering Jewish identity without an Israel connection. Jewish identity and Israel are one."

You don't have to be religious to be a supporter. "It's in the heart," she says. "To be a Jew, make Israel part of your life."

She said Vancouver Jews have warm feelings for Israel. "It's a vital, vigorous community and I've received a very courteous reception here."

PASSOVER AND JERUSALEM

"Three special holidays celebrate for me during the year." (Ex. 23). The three holidays became the pilgrimage holidays to Jerusalem, and Passover is the first of the three. In A View of Jerusalem by Pierre Tetar van Elven, we see visually expressed the language of Psalm 87 "The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwelling places of Jacob."

Tracking down Arafat's 'speech'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

A story which claims that Yasser Arafat outlined a plan in Stockholm, Sweden, to eliminate Israel through the Oslo peace process has sparked an international debate concerning its veracity.

Some maintain that the story is unsullied fact, others claim it is a nefarious example of media manipulation, and still others are just unsure.

The controversy, which has left a long paper trail, has exploded at a sensitive juncture:

• The Mideast peace process, which has divided Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora, has been shaken by a spate of suicide bombings in Israeli cities.

• An Israeli election, too close to call, is set for May 29.

• The Palestine National Council, the parliament-in-exile of the PLO, is scheduled to convene soon with the avowed purpose of amending the PLO's national covenant, which calls for Israel's destruction.

• A Hebrew-language daily, Ha'aretz, recently reported that Israeli and Palestinian officials drafted a secret agreement which purportedly addresses such thorny issues as the future of Jerusalem and the possibility of a Palestinian state, a claim denied by Israel.

The story about Arafat's alleged remarks first appeared in the Feb. 2 edition of the American Jewish Times, a biweekly in Howell, N.J. The newspaper, with a circulation of 5,000, opposes Israel's negotiations with the PLO. The author of the piece, Manfred Lehmann, believes that the current peace process is a fraud and a danger to Israel.

Feature Report

On Feb. 7, the story was broadcast by Arutz Sheva, the off-shore Israeli radio station which supports the Jewish settlement movement in the territories.

On Feb. 9, Lehmann's story was reprinted in the Algemeiner Journal, published in New York City. Dagen, a small, conservative daily newspaper in Bergen, Norway, which is described as "Christian Zionist" in orientation, picked up the story on Feb. 16, and ran it on its front page with a bold headline.

In Israel, the story was carried by, among others, the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz.

It has also received play in The Economist, a British news magazine; in Cal Thomas' syndicated column in The Washington Times; in a Wall Street Journal editorial; and in Gary Rosenblatt's column in The Jewish Week of New York.

In Canada, the story was mentioned by right-of-centre columnist Barbara Amiel in the March 18 issue of Maclean's, and reported in the March 14 edition of the Tribune, the house organ of B'nai Brith Canada.

Throughout North America, the story has been ignored by such dailies as the New York Times, Washington Post, Toronto Star and Globe and Mail.

Asked to explain the omission in his newspaper, the foreign editor of the Globe and Mail, Patrick Martin, said: "The story was terribly murky and the source seemed unreliable. There seemed little basis for believing it. Its authenticity seemed in doubt. It became very questionable. We won't touch a story that seems doubtful."

Lehmann, however, is "absolutely convinced" that his account is true. By his reckoning, Arafat told a closed meeting of Arab ambassadors at the Grand Hotel in late January of his grand strategy toward Israel.

Arafat, chair of the PLO and president of the Palestinian Authority, was reportedly in the Swedish capital to receive a peace prize shared by Peace Now, the Israeli Labor party's young leadership group and the PLO's Fatah Youth organization.

According to Lehmann, Arafat told the Arab envoys that a Palestinian state was in the offing, that the PLO's objective was to split Israel into two psychological camps, that many Jews would leave Israel, and that the PLO planned "to eliminate the State of Israel" and replace it with "a purely Palestinian state."

In an interview from his winter home in Miami Beach, Lehmann claimed that Arafat's purported comments are in line with his calls for holy war against Israel and with Islamic doctrine that Muslims are not permitted to make peace with Israel.

Special report on adoption in our Passover supplement

The News In Brief

CANADA

Cohon To Be Honored

TORONTO – Toronto businessman George A. Cohon and his family will be among a select group of international Jewish families who will be honored as part of the State of Israel Bonds Jerusalem 3000 delegation in April.

Cohon and his family will participate in a special ceremony, where they will encase in a special time capsule, scrolls capturing the legacies of their famliies who have contributed of their energies and resources to the communities in which they live, to the State of Israel and to Israel Bonds.

Heritage Experience

MONTREAL – The national small communities committee of Canadian Jewish Congress is organizing a Summer Family Bar/Bat Mitzvah Heritage Experience in Israel which will take place Aug. 4 to 14.

The itinerary will include visits to Tel Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Masada and much more.

For more information call Shellie Ettinger at 514-931-7531 or Frances Maron of Travel-Ezre at 1-800-387-9966.

ISRAEL

El Al Jet Hit By Lightning

JERUSALEM – An El Al flight to New Delhi and Bangkok was forced to turn around shortly after takeoff last week after it was hit by lightning.

The accident, on March 25, damaged the plane's weather radar equipment, forcing the plane to return to Ben-Gurion Airport for repairs.

None of the 270 passengers on board were injured. The flight took off after spending an hour on the ground.

Hamas Cell Uncovered

JERUSALEM – Palestinian security officials in the Gaza Strip maintain they have uncovered a secret network of the military wing of Hamas that is dedicated to attacking Israel and weakening the Palestinian Authority.

The head of the Palestinian Authority's Preventive Security Service in Gaza, Mohammad Dahlan, was quoted as describing the network as more dangerous than a group of Hamas fugitives wanted by both Israeli and Palestinian police.

Second Terminal Opened

JERUSALEM – In an effort to cope with the expected rush during the Passover holiday, a second terminal started operating at Ben-Gurion Airport.

The terminal, normally used for domestic flights, was converted to handle international charter flights.

Ethiopian Blood Donations

JERUSALEM – Only six Ethiopian immigrants have donated blood since it was disclosed the blood is not used.

All six pints have been frozen pending recommendations by the Navon Committee, investigating Magen David Adom's policy of not informing the donors their blood would be discarded.

Likud On the Internet

JERUSALEM – The Likud party has launched its Web site on the Internet making it the first political party in Israel to establish a presence on the information super highway.

The site will include up-to-date information on the party's election campaign, as well as details about the Likud leadership and the party's history.

The site can be found at http://www.likud.org.il.

Israeli Population Up

JERUSALEM – Israel's population has reached 5.6 million, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The bureau, reporting preliminary results of a 1995 census, said March 25 that Israel's population increased by 40 percent since 1983, when the total population stood at 4 million.

The bureau also said that the number of settlers living in the West Bank and Gaza Strip had grown to 134,000, compared to 24,000 in 1983, when the last census was taken.

Science Pact Signed

JERUSALEM – Israel and the European Union (EU) last week signed a scientific cooperation agreement in Brussels.

Under its terms, scientists from both sides will be able to work together in technology-oriented research programs.

Israel is the first non-European country to be associated with EU research programs, which also gives it access to European private industry.

WORLD

Immigration Reform Bill

WASHINGTON – One week after gutting anti-terrorism legislation, the House of Representatives included a key provision of the measure in an immigration reform bill.

Lawmakers approved streamlined deportation proceedings for accused terrorists living in the United States. The measure, which was buried in the immigration bill, drew no attention during debate.

Mini-mall Halted

NEW YORK – In the wake of criticism from Jewish leaders and the Polish government, construction of a mini-mall across the street from the Auschwitz death camp has been halted.

The project came to a stop last week when a Polish retailing outfit, Krakchemia SA, withdrew its participation from the controversial plan to sell food and other services to visitors to Auschwitz.

Pollard's Hopes Dashed

WASHINGTON – The White House closed the door on Jonathan Pollard's quest for a pardon, with White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta saying that President Bill Clinton opposes an early release for the confessed spy for Israel at this time.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Contents of Arafat speech denied by all

Pearl Herzog, editor of the American Jewish Times, called Israel's talks with the PLO "a piece process" designed to exert pressure on Israel to relinquish territory.

Lehmann, who charged that the Israeli government has tried to suppress the story, claimed that the contents of Arafat's alleged comments were leaked to an unidentified freelance Jewish journalist in Sweden by an unidentified Arab diplomat who attended the meeting.

"The ambassador was struck by the bellicose and hateful tone of the speech," Lehmann said. "He took notes and passed them to a friend."

Lars Storstrand, a Dagen reporter who covered the story and stands behind it, said that one of his sources was the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem.

According to Akiva Eldar, the Washington correspondent of Ha'aretz who has followed the story closely, the International Christian Embassy is against the Oslo peace process. Efforts by The CJN to reach the International Christian Embassy were unsuccessful.

Gadi Baltianasky, the press counsellor of the Israeli Embassy in Washington, told The Canadian Jewish News that Arafat never stated that his goal is the elimination of Israel.

"This story was invented by interested elements. I will not name them. They're doing such a thing not for the first time. The aim of those people who oppose the peace process outside Israel is to try to sabotage any chance of success of this process, to damage the chances."

Speaking from Stockholm, the PLO representative in Sweden, Eugene Makhlouf, who claimed he was present at the meeting, denied that Arafat had ever spoken in terms of undermining Israel's existence.

"He did not say a single word of this. Arafat said the Oslo process is the only way for the peace process to go ahead, and he expressed the hope it would succeed."

Makhlouf added that extremists on both sides are attempting "to disrupt" the peace process.

"It's a conspiracy to discredit Arafat at this time," observed Rashad Saleh, head of Palestine House in the greater Toronto area. "Arafat has many enemies. People are fishing in muddy waters and spreading rumors."

Eldar, who discussed the story on the television program Canada AM in early March, said that neither the Israeli nor the American ambassadors in Stockholm have been able to clearly verify the accuracy of the story.

"It looks like a campaign of disinformation to discredit the peace process," he noted.

Eldar said that just before appearing on Canada AM, he had read Cal Thomas' syndicated column, in which he wrote that "Arafat's remarks ... were later confirmed by Israel's most respected military correspondent, Ze'ev Schiff, in the Ha'aretz newspaper."

But in a March 15 letter to the editor in the Washington Times, Schiff protested. "I never wrote about Mr. Arafat's meeting with the Arab ambassadors, and this was not mentioned in any of my columns. I can neither confirm nor deny that Mr. Arafat said this."

Ehud Ya'ari, in his April 4 column in The Jerusalem Report, claims that "the government of Israel already has ... full confirmation of the accuracy of the words Arafat has been quoted as saying in his meeting with Arab diplomats in Stockholm."

Ya'ari could not be reached for clarification. "I understand he is quite inundated with such requests from journalists and cannot manage to speak with everyone who calls him," said a receptionist at The Jerusalem Report.

Paul Michaels, director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee, said the story remains unverified. "We ask the media to be accurate in dealing with Israeli and Middle East issues," he cautioned.

David Bedein of the Institute for Peace Education in Jerusalem, which monitors Arafat's speeches, said he had "no way of knowing" whether his alleged comments in Stockholm are accurate.

But he pointed out that Arafat has delivered scores of inflammatory speeches in the past year.

Eli Yerushalmi, chargé d'affaires at Israel's embassy in Ottawa, said "no one in Israel" really takes Lehmann's story seriously.

Gary Rubin, executive director of Americans for Peace Now, said the story lacks attribution and is therefore "totally unfounded."

A long-distance hug for the people of Israel

Hirsh Goodman, the editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Report is an experienced newspaperman and writer. We have grown accustomed to reading his freshly-reasoned and concisely-written analyses of contemporary political events in Israel. He backs away from no issues. He "paints" what he sees in clear, vivid, bold strokes. Because of its uncompromising honesty, his column in the April 4 issue of the magazine struck like a jab into the solar plexus of our concern and care for Israel.

Goodman wrote about "how vulnerable (Israel) has become, just how close we are to exploding emotionally and physically". He describes Israel as "a country on tenterhooks...In four months, this country has gone through unbelievable trauma: it started with Rabin's assassination, and now it's this spate of suicide bombings. Every nerve is raw. Everything seems to hang in the balance. We are walking on eggshells."

Sense of siege

What grips the reader most though and steers him toward a feeling of melancholy is the column's downcast, sentimental conclusion from this usually upbeat, unsentimental writer. "If Israel has ever been in need of a hug, the time is now. Perhaps this is a war that is hard to see and understand. But never has the time for encouragement been so ripe."

We must provide that encouragement. It mustn't be maudlin or mawkish. Rather, it must be realistic and resolute, based on the deep personal and collective truth of shared peoplehood and common destiny, on the lofty notion that we are responsible one for the other, and on a view of Jewish history as unfolding along a metaphysical line, inscrutably but inevitably toward a better future.

In an attempt to respond to Goodman's plea, I reproduce excerpts of an article which I wrote nine years ago, to try to abate the sense of existential siege felt by Israel and its people at the height of the intifadah.

As Goodman points out, with Israel "on the eve of an national election that promises to be ugly, and with international sympathy...dissipating into tacit condemnation," that sense of siege also persists today. The specific focus of what I wrote nine years ago dealt with Jerusalem, but its overall objective was encouragement to the Jewish people inside and outside of Israel. Thus it applies as much today as it did then.

As we suggest elsewhere in The CJN, in the editorial, the connection between Jerusalem and the need to provide encouragement will become evident in the days and months ahead when the international community begins shining an increasingly questioning and intense spotlight on Jewish sovereignty over all of Jerusalem.

"In their war, Israel's enemies have resorted to a propaganda of moral inversion. Over the past 20 years, they have insidiously appropriated the symbols and the vocabulary of Jewish history. The Holocaust as hoax. Zionism as racism. Israel as Nazi. Palestinians as victims. Arabs as Jews. As a result, without reference to historical truth, the world has come to redefine its terms of reference in the Middle East, withdrawing from Israel the aspects of the argument that formerly were hers: equity and passion.

"And now we are in the midst of the latest appropriation - Jerusalem's stones. The visual imagery is strong and clear: tattered, courageous, stone-throwing youth against a mighty and fearful army, the few against the many, David versus Goliath. But the symbolism is false and the imagery contrived. We must understand this for what it is - a further tactic in the effort to undermine the only Jewish state on earth: Israel.

"We must not surrender to those intent on Israel's harm, the symbolic possession of the stones of our history, the precious pieces of our millennial longing. Those who would deny our history must be the possessors of its symbols. Not unopposed.

" Jerusalem's stones are the anvil of our memory on which was forged, in captivity and dispersion, the nation-sustaining dream of Return. We have always loved these stones, even as we have always loved Jerusalem.

" 'Arise and have compassion upon Zion. It is time to be gracious unto her; the appointed time has come. For your servants hold her stones dear and have pity on her dust.' (Psalm 102:15)

"Jerusalem's stones bear the secret stirrings of our past. We have held them in our hands and carried them in our hearts. We have erected altars with them, and gravestones. We have kissed them; we have prayed with them. We have blessed them, and in turn, sought their blessing. They are the Temple. They are the Kotel. They are Jerusalem. They are Zion. Through the long night of our exile they were our signposts, our future, to be rebuilt, reassembled into a national normalcy. And now they are hurled against us. We cannot surrender their sanctity to those who would decree for us no future and no normalcy.

Secret stirrings of our past

"In his firm grip, young David held five smooth stones. He stepped forward boldly, because the others, standing aghast and ashamed on the ridge of the valley, would not dare. No choice save combat existed for him.

"Today's stone-throwers, though young, are not David. They step forward in stealth, masked, while on the side, their leaders cheer and exhort and decry and defame. The youngsters are the weapons; the rocks the excuse. Possibilities beyond combat are not even considered.

"Three generations of Jews have stood in modern Jewish history, witness to Israel's rebirth: the Remnant, which, in 1947 proclaimed "We shall not die, but live;" the Reawakened, which, in 1967, was stirred back to Jewish life; and now, the Remote, which, alas, in 1987, finds the road to Zion strewn with confusing images, less inviting, less certain.

"We must restore to their hearts what has been lost to their doubt - the justice of our cause, and, the cause of our justice - our history, our right to be sovereign in the land of our dreams, the land which our stones have built and would yet build.

"Israel is Jerusalem. Jerusalem is in the stones. The stones belong to us. No inversion or attempted appropriation can make it otherwise. Throughout the ages we pledged to set Jerusalem above our highest joys. We shall not repudiate that pledge. To do so would be to repudiate the Bible, our history. And if we repudiate the Bible, we repudiate ourselves."

Not repudiating ourselves is the flip side of hugging Israel. MBD

Court dismisses Heritage Front contempt charges

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court judge last week dismissed a charge of contempt of court against the Heritage Front, its leader Wolfgang Droege and Front member June French.

The recorded telephone message that formed the basis of the complaint against the three did not vilify the Jewish community to the extent required to support a contempt charge, Judge Bud Cullen stated.

"I am not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the evidence demonstrates that the message was likely to promote hatred or contempt of the Jewish community," he wrote in an 18-page judgment.

The case against Droege was launched by the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC), which alleged that Droege, French and the Front had violated a consent order not to communicate messages on the telephone that are likely to expose people to hatred or contempt.

Evidence presented by the CHRC alleged that on Feb. 2, 1995, a telephone message recorded by French charged that "Nazi hunters are on the rampage."

The recording criticized government efforts to bring Nazi war criminals to justice and it asserted, "The Jewish community is prepared to pull elderly men out of nursing homes and off life-support systems ..."

In his judgment, Cullen was critical of Mervin Witter, director of the CHRC's Ontario region, who had transcribed the message. In one transcript Witter had written "Jewish mafia" while in a second he had written "Jewish lobbyists."

In addition, Witter had first written that the Canadian government was "seeking vengeance for the Jewish community," while in the second transcript he had written it was "seeking justice for the Jewish community."

Witter's mistakes were serious and affected the evidence of Susan Ehrlich, an expert on linguistics and text analysis, Cullen wrote.

The judge rejected Ehrlich's analysis of the message, saying the recorded message "does not vilify the Jewish community in the same manner or degree" as earlier messages by the Front that formed the "baseline" for comparison.

"I am also troubled that neither the CHRC nor Ehrlich took the time to examine whether there was even a grain of truth in some of the allegations in the subject message," he added.

Michelle Falardeau-Ramsay, deputy chief of the CHRC, said a decision on an appeal has not yet been taken, but she suggested "this might be a problem because it's a question of fact only" and legal issues were not at the heart of Cullen's decision.

The CHRC will continue to monitor the Front's hotline and won't be deterred from other legal proceedings should they be warranted, she added.

"Canadian Jewish Congress was very disappointed with the decision," said Ellen Cole, the organization's chair of community relations.

"We point out that the Heritage Front hot line has a notorious history of vilifying minorities in Canada ... In this instance, the message clearly promoted contempt towards our community. Although the documentation in this case could have been better prepared, we believe there is room for the CHRC to consider an appeal," she said.

Tel Aviv mayor to visit

TORONTO — The mayor of Tel Aviv is coming to Canada primarily to thank Canadian supporters of the Tel Aviv Foundation.

Roni Milo will visit Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal to resuscitate the foundation, relaunched a year ago after being dormant for some time.

He will also study the subway systems of Toronto and Montreal because underground transit has become a priority in Tel Aviv, the foundation's director, David Altman, told The CJN during a recent visit here.

Since its establishment in 1977, the Tel Aviv Foundation has raised over $250 million worldwide for day-care centres, kindergartens, seniors' facilities, public parks and sports centres, especially in poor and depressed neighborhoods.

Last year, the foundation opened a centre for troubled adolescents donated by Claridge Israel Inc., the holding company owned by Montreal's Charles Bronfman.

Milo, who chairs the foundation, will meet a Toronto contributor who has donated a public park to Tel Aviv. The dedication will take place in June.

Milo will be in Vancouver from April 10 to 13, in Montreal on the 14th and Toronto from the 15th to the 18th. While in Toronto, he will take part in the launch of Yom Hashoah services at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Earl Bales Park.

JNF hands out honors as part of Jerusalem 3000

TORONTO — A Jewish "group of seven" was honored here last week by the Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Toronto, as the organization launched its year-long Jerusalem 3000 celebrations.

Those receiving a Jerusalem of Gold Award from JNF world chair Moshe Rivlin were historian Irving Abella, Judge Rosalie Abella, Syrian Jewry activist Judy Feld Carr, Livent chairman Garth Drabinsky, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen, businessman and communal volunteer Allan Silber and Rabbi Irwin Witty, the retiring director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education.

Carr noted that a total of 3,211 Syrian Jews escaped the country as a result of the efforts of the Toronto Jewish community.

The gala evening at a packed Leah Posluns Theatre, co-sponsored by Canadian Zionist Federation, also heard greetings from Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar, JNF Toronto president Tom Ungar and Naomi Frankenburg, national JNF Jerusalem 3000 chair.

Rivlin, a seventh-generation sabra, recounted his ancestors' perilous, year-long journey from Eastern Europe to Palestine, beginning in 1810. He said they were asked to go live in the Holy Land by the Vilna Gaon.

Soon to be unveiled in Jerusalem will be a public park named for slain prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, he said.

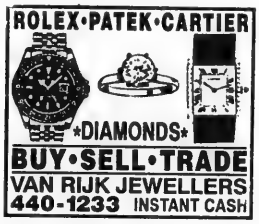
Rivlin exhorted Diaspora Jews to put aside differences of opinion on politics. "If it's one thing that unites us, it's Jerusalem. If a day goes by that we don't strengthen Jerusalem, we will be sorry. It's much more important to build, build, build," he said to applause.

He called on Toronto Jewry to support building Gan Yaldei Yisrael, a JNF project in the Jerusalem Peace Forest, a children's park.

A pitch was also made for the construction of KKL Park Jerusalem 3000, a huge JNF anniversary gift to the Israeli capital.

Envisioned as an outdoor amphitheatre and recreation site in southwestern Jerusalem, plans call for picnic sites, playgrounds and a venue for special events that will accommodate 40,000 people.

The evening's highlight was a colorful musical play, Our Jerusalem — Gan Yaldei Yisrael, staged by 35 Toronto teenagers. The production encapsuled in song and dance 3,000 years of Jerusalem's history.



Hospitals the losers in govt. funding plan, Baycrest exec. says

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week's announcement by the Ontario government that it will boost funding to community-based home care for the elderly by $170 million is good news and bad news for the Jewish community, says an official of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

It's good news because the Jewish community has long lobbied for more money for home care for the elderly. But it's bad news because the extra funds will come at the expense of the amount the province spends on hospitals, points out Baycrest vice-president Moshe Greengarten.

Health Minister Jim Wilson last week said the funding boost for home care will mean an additional 80,000 to 100,000 people will get long-term care at home.

But the extra money will come from the $1.3 billion the Tory government plans to cut from hospital budgets over the next three years.

That means less money for Baycrest's hospital and home for the aged, Greengarten notes.

"The community will benefit [from the boost to home-care funding]. It's needed and welcome. But it's a reallocation of funds from the hospital sector to the home sector. We will definitely be affected, but we don't know yet how."

Under the new funding formula for homes for the aged and nursing homes, about $144 million will be taken from 138 institutions, and redistributed to 362 institutions, meaning Baycrest may get a much smaller piece of the pie.

Starting in June, nursing homes and homes for the aged will be funded according to what kind of care patients need.

But the allocation of more money to home care means more Jewish elderly, especially those on waiting lists for institutions, will be able to remain in their homes longer, Greengarten explained.

THE COMMUNITY IS INVITED

From coast to coast

Israeli organization thrives behind the scenes

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite her expertise, you will rarely hear Sari Revkin's name or see her face in media reports dealing with social issues in Israel.

The 41-year-old Brooklyn-born director of SHATIL, who was in Toronto and Montreal recently, is firm about operating only "behind the curtains."

The Jerusalem-based organization that she has headed for the past 12 years was founded by the New Israel Fund (NIF) in 1982 to provide Israeli non-profit social change organizations with free hands-on assistance in such areas as media relations, advocacy and fundraising.

After Ethiopian immigrants rioted in January following revelations that Israeli blood banks had been discarding most blood donated by Ethiopian olim, Revkin was asked to speak on an American radio program about Jews and Racial Justice, she said in an interview at the Toronto office of the New Israel Fund of Canada.

"Absolutely not," was her response. "One of the key issues that people were so angry about is who took leadership in the community. For us to speak in their name is as bad as everything the government's been doing."

A social worker by profession, Revkin has worked closely with groups representing virtually every segment of Israeli society since she joined SHATIL in 1984, a year after making aliyah. At that time she was the only paid employee, not even working full-time.

In the past dozen years, the organization, whose Hebrew name is an acronym for Consulting Support Service, has expanded to three offices (the main one in Jerusalem and outreach offices in Haifa and Beersheva) with a total of 30 employees. Its budget has grown from $25,000 (US) to $1.5 million.

Over the years, SHATIL has assisted a total of 500 organizations, not all of which are funded by the NIF. Some are well established; others are informal groups of people wanting to change their situation.

The Beersheva office, which opened last year, is largely supported by Canadians, Revkin noted. It serves the entire Negev, reaching out specifically to the Bedouin population so that they can have greater access to services such as preschools.

Canadians have been involved with SHATIL not only as donors but as volunteers, lending their skills to SHATIL or its organizations for six months or more. There is also a volunteer program for professionals who share their expertise on a short-term basis, even a day or two, she said.

Sari Revkin

Now that Israeli elections are imminent, SHATIL is helping organizations get their issues on the political agenda. "Since we don't have a representational government, [politicians] have to build constituencies."

Revkin emphasized that SHATIL doesn't write grant proposals or do other work for the organizations, but focuses on teaching them how to help themselves.

Now SHATIL is branching out further, helping non-profit organizations in countries like Bulgaria develop a SHATIL model.

"We see ourselves as emissaries of democracy, [sharing] what we've learned with emerging democracies."

Jewish literary magazine becomes reality for students

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A student's idea — to start a Jewish literary magazine — has become a reality, thanks to a $600 (US) student initiative grant from the Hillel International Foundation.

York University student Sidura Ludwig, 19, recruited three of her peers — Janna Cohen, 21; Moishe Weinberg, 24; and Dave Gordon, 24 — to co-edit the publication with her. All four are English majors.

Dorot: A Contemporary Jewish Literary Magazine is hot off the press, and a launch party was held recently at the York University Student Centre.

The publication's name is the Hebrew word for Generations. "We want to show the public the talent of today's youth," say the editors in the first issue.

"Our mandate is to publish creative pieces — fiction and some non-fiction," said Ludwig recently at York's Jewish Student Federation, a sponsor of the magazine.

"The bottom line is, we want well-written pieces from diverse points of view. We should be getting people to think. If not, we're not doing our job."

The editors also welcome artwork. All submissions must have a Jewish theme, although contributors need not be Jewish themselves.

The first edition is available at Jewish campus offices in Toronto and in limited quantities, in other Canadian cities.

A mixed bag of prose and poetry, with a gracefully executed cover illustration by Liora Zion, who also designed the logo, the 8½ by 5½ inch, 30-page first effort includes eleven written pieces. Among them are a poignant allegorical tale, an essay on a York Arab Student Federation display, a sensitively written short story about a teenager dealing with the death of his alcoholic grandfather and four poems.

The editors mulled over all contributions, checking them for literary merit, Jewish content and appropriateness for university-age readers.

"We should have had five editors," Ludwig said with a laugh, referring to the occasional need for a tie-breaking opinion.

The editors aim to publish twice yearly and hope to distribute Dorot across the country eventually. Submission deadline for the next issue is Oct. 18, 1996.

Dorot can be reached c/o Jewish Student Federation, 442 Student Centre, York University, 4700 Keele St., North York, Ontario M3J 1P3.

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which "help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair."

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. "The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5, regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Passover 5756

The splendor of the seder only starts with the story. As we have written in the past, the seder is a singularly special occasion among Jewish holidays. It exceeds "mere" celebration in a way far beyond all other holidays. Indeed, as Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa suggests on page 9 of The CJN, that is its essence and its purpose. The seder is an excursion into the far-off but ever near reaches of Jewish history.. Through collective experience and collective memory, the soul of the individual soars to a point in the national past.

The seder evening is a rich pageant of history, a dialectic of discovery, a culinary feast in which all who are hungry are invited to join, and all who are in need, are invited to take part. Reclining comfortably around a long table, with family and friends, the exodus is "re-enacted" deep into the night. The eyes of the children are made wide with tricks and tales, miracles and merriment, symbols and song.

Very few stories indeed, in the Bible or in classic western literature, can match the sheer drama, the force, the imagery and the sweep of the exodus from Egypt. To what part of the human imagination does the story not travel? Which corner of the human heart is left untouched?

As history, as metaphor; as politics, as theology; as prose and as poetry, the story of the delivery of Israel out of bondage by God's outstretched and powerful hand is the seminal fire that burns in the innermost part of the human spirit. All torches of human endeavor-- idealism, liberty, freedom, revolution, justice, the rule of law, decency, goodness, truth, conscience, hope, possibility, future and optimism -- are sustained by and take their flame from this original fire.

The seder summons us to come together, sit together and speak together. Around that long table, we gather each year to tell, re-tell and "re-enact" the story and thereby, to ensure that the magnificent original fire will burn for all generations.

...and Jerusalem

Like Yom Kippur, the most solemn of the Jewish holidays, the seder concludes with the proclamation: "Next year in Jerusalem."

For 3,000 years, in each generation, around each of those long tables, we have uttered this very same proclamation. It is a metaphysical tie, a hope, a vision and an inspiration. It is also a fact that will soon need to be stated and re-stated and re-stated yet again by all of us who have gathered round a seder table in 5756.

After the upcoming elections in Israel, the issue of Jerusalem will occupy centre stage in the "final status" negotiations. The election platforms of both major parties include solidly, unassailable planks on the subject of Jerusalem. They are both committed to maintaining the Oslo process. And they are both committed to an undivided Jerusalem standing forever as the capital of the sovereign Jewish state.

There will undoubtedly be a great deal of international pressure brought to bear on Israel to offer up some form of territorial, functional or political compromise on Jerusalem for the sake of Arab honor, Palestinian dignity and a "comprehensive peace" in the region. Thus, regardless of the party that wins the election in Israel, the entire Jewish world must be united on the subject of Jerusalem. Inter-communal divisions must fall to the side. Isaiah's plea must form our code of political conduct on the subject of Jerusalem. "Rejoice with Jerusalem, and be glad for her, all you who love her. Rejoice with her in joy, all you who mourn over her."

For three thousand years, Jerusalem has occupied our hearts and filled our prayers. Jerusalem has always been the pilgrim's destination, the seder's conclusion, and Passover's fulfilment. It is the blue light at the centre of the heart of the flame of Judaism's seminal fire.

Dry Bones

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

At a seder in 1922 at the home of David Marks in Vancouver, Benny Kubelsky met Sadie Marks. Five years later they were married and became famous under the stage names of Jack Benny and Mary Livingstone. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Time to give thanks

There are usually good reasons to do or not to do something, and sometimes it is better to do it late rather than later. I would like to thank, while I still have a voice, the American Army, my liberators in Dachau; the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Jewish people of Canada who gave what money they could, who gave their time, who opened their homes, who, after the Holocaust, helped hundreds of boys and girls like myself to come to Canada to start a new life.

I was one of those "boys" in 1948, who arrived in Halifax from Germany via the Kinderheim in Prien, a place also maintained and staffed by Jewish money. What this granting of a new beginning meant for me then, what it means to me today, from a distance of almost half a century, words cannot adequately tell.

Life and an opportunity to prevail is all I ever wanted. I found myself a sole survivor at the age of 14. My mother had five sisters, all married and they all had children, all lost. I had lost my father in 1931, when I was only one year old. I had a tremendous desire to be, to want to continue. It seems that throughout my lifetime, it was the goodwill and generosity of other people who made life possible and fulfilling for me. Relatives, friends, teachers, persons often strangers to me, reached out to help. I am now a father and grandfather whose very survival was and is immeasurably helped by you, the people of Canada.

I am deeply moved, not only for what I received and am receiving, not only because you spoke up and reached out, but also for granting me that I too may be part of "you," that I too am able to contribute.

Terror must not derail peace process

Outrage and condemnation will and should follow the latest cowardly and sickening atrocites by members of Hamas on innocent civilians in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. As deplorable and despicable as the acts are to any right thinking human being, they must not be used to derail the peace process. To do so would be to play into the hands of those whose single agenda is the destruction of the State of Israel. While doing everything reasonable to keep Israel an open and free democratic society, the Israeli and Palestinian authorities must implement stringent methods to ensure that those who harbor and encourage such acts are monitored and where necessary, punished according to law.

The Hamas leadership must know where these terrorist madmen are trained and by whom they are funded and where the bombs are assembled. Undoubtedly, much support comes from renegade states like Libya, Sudan, Iraq and Iran, and when links are established, UN sanctions should be immediately imposed. The Palestinian Authority should declare Hamas an illegal organization and prosecute all members who support its murderous activities. By doing so, Yasser Arafat will empirically demonstrate that he is committed to peaceful coexistence with Israel and is not simply using the process as a vehicle to impose the PLO mandate to drive the Israelis into the sea.

Attorney general has to answer

I was shocked to learn that Attorney General Charles Harnick, my own MPP, had caused Sabina Citron's privately laid charges against Ernst Zundel for conspiracy to promote hatred and publishing defamatory libel to be withdrawn because of "insufficient evidence." As Citron notes in your report (March 21), Harnick had been very critical of past attorney generals' behavior and, indeed, his own re-election campaign literature had clearly stated that he intended to make an issue out of why no attorney general in Ontario had ever given signed authority to have Zundel prosecuted under the anti-hate legislation. That is why Citron has had to lay charges privately and under different laws.

Harnick has a great deal to answer for!

Rabbi Marmur's lesson in humility

Lorrie Goldstein's response to Rabbi Dow Marmur misses the point. It is Premier Mike Harris who believes himself to be "right," that only he knows what is in our best interest. He sees himself as "the savior."

Rabbi Marmur emphasized "G-dliness," which has been dangerously lacking for a number of years. It is the major priority of life.

It is the arrogance, the lack of respect and dignity and the condescending attitude of this government that enrages us. It is the speed, thoughtlessness and lack of planning with which decisions have been made that are totally unacceptable.

In my opinion, Rabbi Marmur is giving the government a lesson in humility. It is the religious community that must call us to task since too many have forsaken that part of ourselves that makes us human.

Understanding God's promise to Israel

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Illustration by Edward Dunbar

Passover is designed for us to gain a profound appreciation of our history.

There are three paragraphs in the Haggadah which address this issue. The first deals with our ancestors as idol worshippers, the second focuses on God keeping the promise to Abraham and the third concerns the sustaining nature of the promise.

These form an interrelated series: the first paragraph goes back to the roots; the second reflects on the present moment — in seder terms, the exodus from Egypt; and the third paragraph reflects on the post-exodus realities, up to and including the present.

"At the very outset our ancestors were idol worshippers, but now God has brought us near to serve God, as it is written: Yehoshua said to the entire nation: Thus says the Lord, God of Israel: Your fathers always lived on the other side of the river, Terach the father of Abraham and Nahor, and they worshipped other Gods. Then I took your father, Abraham, from over the river and led him through the entire land of Canaan; I increased his offspring and gave him Isaac. To Isaac I gave Jacob and Esau; to Esau I gave Mount Seir to inherit, but Jacob and his children descended into Egypt." (Yehoshua, 24:2-4).

A full appreciation of history demands going back to the beginnings, to those events which may seem inconsequential but which in hindsight are crucial to our understanding of what we are all about.

Thus, we go back to the very first days, when our ancestors tasted other menus and lived other lifestyles. But our spiritual parents recognized the folly of these alternatives and embraced the way of God. God has now brought us near because of Abraham, who rejected idolatry and realized the existence of one God only. Abraham transmitted this monotheistic belief to Isaac, Isaac to Jacob, and Jacob to his 12 sons, who were to become the super-families, or tribes of Israel.

The Haggadah quotes from Sefer Yehoshua (the Book of Joshua). The quote is not to prove that our ancestors were idol worshippers, since only the idol-worshipping ancestry is referred to and in any event, that point is explicit in the first verses. The subsequent verses, referring to God's taking Abraham and giving him Isaac, and blessing Isaac with Jacob, followed by Jacob and his children going down to Egypt, only tell half the story. The actual bringing near of the people of Israel to serve God is elaborated in subsequent verses, but these do not appear in the Haggadah. It must be assumed that the omission of these verses is no accident.

That reason may be linked to the purpose of citing the verses from Sefer Yehoshua in the first place: to prove that when contemplating our history, we must go back to the beginnings.

For this purpose, there is no better source than the verses in Sefer Yehoshua. Yehoshua has summoned the Israelites just prior to his passing, to give them a parting message to reinforce their faith in God. The parting message is an eloquent synopsis of Israelite history, from the idol worship of their ancestors to their settlement in the land of Israel. After pointing to all the great deliverances effected by God for Israel, Yehoshua then elicits a promise that they will remain steadfastly faithful to God.

Yehoshua does not focus only on their immediate past. He takes the people back to the days of idol worship, to stress that our spiritual ancestors had the wisdom and courage to reject idolatry.

In addition, Yehoshua urges the people to see themselves as part of a larger context. They are not a new entity making a new beginning in a new land. They are in Israel because of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses and Aaron. They must not lose sight of their history, of their triumph over adversity.

The verses cited from Sefer Yehoshua offer a vivid illustration of how we must approach the telling of the story at the seder. The story has its climactic moment; it also has its vital beginnings.

Immediately after the last point in the verses that "Jacob and his children descended into Egypt," Yehoshua reminds the people of how the redemption from bondage was effected by God through Moses and Aaron. Since this redemption is the central theme of the seder, it is unnecessary to cite Yehoshua's references to it.

We move on to the second paragraph, about God keeping the promise made to Israel.

"Blessed is (God) the keeper of God's promise to Israel, blessed is God. For the Holy One, blessed is God, took into account the end (limits of endurance) to do according to that which had been said to our father Abraham in the Covenant between the parts, as it is written: God said to Abraham: Know with certainty that your offspring will be aliens in a land that is not theirs, and they will enslave and oppress them for 400 years. And also the nation whom they shall serve will I judge, after which they will leave with a great bounty (heritage)." (Bereshit,15:13-14).

We contemplate the sense of timing that was involved in the redemption. The history of Israel up to the point of redemption is a history of suffering, but a measured suffering. God took into account the limits of endurance and how much the people could endure before reaching the breaking point. That is when He intervened.

God had previously promised Abraham that his children would be enslaved in a foreign land and that they would be redeemed with a great deliverance. Both the servitude and the deliverance are part of the promise. That deliverance was promised is understandable, but why was enslavement also promised?

The human being cannot really appreciate freedom if the absence of freedom has never been experienced. Thus, enslavement in a strange land was intended to engrain in the Judaic psyche an appreciation of freedom and of home. This was part of the promise. God told Abraham that his ancestors would inherit the land of Israel and that they would also appreciate the land.

The people of Israel left Egypt with a deeper understanding of human dignity and of what being free means for the human being yearning to live a meaningful existence. That the Jewish people have throughout history been the champions of human rights is no accident. It is a lasting legacy, part of the great bounty that was promised to Abraham when his ancestors would leave Egypt.

Unfortunately, the appreciation of freedom, of the land of Israel and of God Who granted these great gifts, did not endure. Expulsion from the land and exile therefore followed.

The obligation to recall the enslavement in Egypt is thus an imperative to continually remember what absence of freedom means, to value freedom and to be grateful to God as the agent of that freedom. Historically, we have had lapses, but we resolve on Pesach evening to be guided by the past towards better behavior in the present.

We move now to the third paragraph of this important trilogy. It offers a deeper understanding of the ultimate meaning of God's promise to Israel, a meaning with implications for our own times.

"It is this that has sustained our ancestors and us. For not merely one has risen against us to annihilate us. Rather, in every generation they rise against us to annihilate us, but the holy One, blessed is God, rescues us from their hand (designs)."

Implicit in the promise given by God to Abraham is the assurance that no matter what they may be forced to endure, the people of Israel will never be destroyed. They will persevere through the worst pogroms, crusades and mass murders. The losses may be heavy, but the people of Israel and the idea of Israel will never end.

All this is implicit in the promise.

In explicit terms, God spoke only about the exile and enslavement in Egypt and the eventual redemption from bondage. Implicitly however, the promise goes beyond the Egyptian enslavement. For it is small comfort to know that your great-grandchildren will benefit from a great deliverance, but that after a few more generations, your family will be totally destroyed. The promise of deliverance applies to all of Jewish history.

It is this, the implicit pledge in the promise, that has sustained our ancestors and us. We have often hovered on the edge of disappearance, but at the last moment, or when people seemed almost lost, God intervened to save the day and the future.

During the seder, we culminate the short excursion through Jewish history with a triumphal tone, lifting the cup of wine to sing God's praises. We do not exult; we exalt. Our survival is not our victory as much as it is God's. With all that we have endured, we are still grateful to be alive and free to tell the story.

Our cup is full even though we may have reason to complain. For it is characteristic of the community of Israel to magnify the good that God has done for us, to be grateful and appreciative. We express the hope that the entire community will soon be able to voice such thanks.

Next year, may we all be able to celebrate Pesach in Jerusalem!

Why wasn't Netanyahu at summit?

By Emil Fackenheim

I started this column after the Israeli government accepted the Nobel Prize (July 1995). Had it refused to do so until there was peace, the whole country would have supported it. But in accepting the prize, the government widened still further the Israeli polarization already caused — or in any case widened — by the Oslo accord.

Now I have a sense of déja vu. The "Summit of the Peace Makers" is about to take place, but Shimon Peres has not invited Benjamin Netanyahu to join him at Sharm el-Sheik. The reason given is that U.S. President Bill Clinton is not bringing a Republican, and British Prime Minister John Major is not bringing a Laborite. But the United States and Britain are not at war. In contrast — as Peres himself has said — after four suicide massacres in 10 days, Israel is. When the United States was at war, FDR kept consulting Republican Senator Vandenberg; and Clement Attlee was in Winston Churchill's cabinet.

The announced subject of the "Summit" is "international terrorism." It so happens that on this particular subject Netanyahu is, among politicians, one of Israel's longest and most persistent students. To say nothing of his earlier work, there is his recent Fighting Terrorism, a book available in America since last October, and soon available in Israel as well. Precisely because he has stressed all along the need for fighting terrorism worldwide, he would, at the "Summit," have special authority to protect against deflections, bound to occur, from the particular terrorism that caused the hasty convocation of the Summit. And no Israeli could insist on stressing the four suicide massacres of Jews in Israel, without asking whether — what with Israeli withrawal from areas vital to her security — Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority (PA) is part of the problem or part of the solution. Will even-handed attention be given to both possibilities? Here are some questions:

Prior to Oslo, Yitzhak Rabin deported many chief Hamas inciters, and more than 200 murdered Jews might, arguably, still be alive had the world supported him. Instead, coming down on him like a ton of bricks, the world forced him to take them back. Will the Summit now support such Israeli action, at the same time — lest once again they are stuck in no-man's land — provide a place where to take them — say, Oslo?

In clear violation of the Oslo accord, European politicians have kept visiting Orient House in Jerusalem, encouraging PLO claims to the city. For obvious reasons, they are staying away this time, but will they return in a few weeks, or announce that, until there is real peace, they will never set foot there again?

To turn from the world to Israel and Hamas, the British used to bury Muslim suicide terrorists in pig skins, preventing their entry into heaven and apparently this tactic worked: the word got around and without their reward in heaven the suicide terrorism stopped. Will Israel announce that in the future it will emulate this policy?

To turn from Israel and Hamas to Israel and Arafat, will Israel, with support of the Summit, follow its announced policy and interrupt the peace process unless Arafat makes, not a few cosmetic changes in the Covenant calling for Israel's destruction, but removes 30 of its 33 articles?

To turn to the world, Israel, Arafat and terrorism, in the past the PA has arrested wanted Hamas terrorists, only to release them after a suitable time. Despite many requests by Israel, to this date no Arab terrorists, however heinous their crimes against Israelis, have been handed over to Israeli justice. Will the "Summit" cause Arafat to change his policy?

With the leader of the opposition as well as the prime minister present at the Summit, I would be a bit more optimistic about positive answers to these questions. At least the world would have been shown that, when it comes to massacres of Jews, Israel is united.

Becoming a just and holy people

By David Hartman

As Pesach approaches, many of us are asking ourselves: How can we celebrate our liberation while feeling the pain and anxiety of the recent acts of terrorism and fanatic violence? What possible meaning can the words "Next Year in Jerusalem" have when Jews fear riding on buses or walking the streets of Jerusalem?

We believed in our hearts that our return to Jerusalem would usher in a period when Jews would no longer feel the anxiety of homelessness and powerlessness, when the Jewish psyche would regain a sense of security and trust.

It appears, however, that the idea of redemption in terms of total security and safety is more of a messianic hope than an historical fact. In this sense, the prayer "Next year in Jerusalem" still remains unfulfilled because we realize that returning home – in the fullest sense – remains an aspiration and not a description of our lived reality.

Nevertheless, we continue to celebrate the holiday of Pesach and to retell the great drama of liberation which marks the birth of our people. The significance of this lies, I believe, in its deep formative effect on Jewish consciousness. The story of this founding moment of our history combines two countervailing motifs: a great hope for redemption and a profound understanding of the pain and suffering of unredeemed history.

Jewish history and Jewish memory begin with the words: "We were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt." The first memory engraved in our souls is that of slavery and exploitation, of the humiliation and degradation of being subject to the arbitrary will of a political despot.

"A new king arose over Egypt, who did not know Joseph" (Exod. 1:8) Despotism cannot be healed by finding favor or by appeasement. The abuses of power are endemic to the human condition. History may always give rise to new pharaohs who seek power without limits, who feel no moral compunction in reducing human beings to objects. The story of Passover shatters any romantic illusion about the inherent goodness of human nature and history.

However, our movement from Egypt to Sinai – from the cruel despotism of Pharaoh to the hopeful vision of Moses – informs the harsh reality of human oppression with the dream of becoming a holy people. As long as we maintain Moses' dream – as long as we understand the significance of commandment, of law and of justice and we don't lose sight of what human life can and should be – we can face the realities of human history without despair.

Tell your children the story of Pharaoh and Egypt. Do not romanticize life or deny the reality of exploitation and injustice. But, at the same time, bring them to Sinai, to the place where a nation of slaves heard a call to aspire to holiness and justice.

Throughout Jewish history, we never revelled in the degradation of Egypt because we held on to the dream of Sinai and Jerusalem. Despite our bitter experiences of hatred and moral ugliness, our psyches were not defined by our suffering. Our longing for Jerusalem was the expression of our dream that one day the sword would be turned into the plowshare.

In recent history, the rebuilding of Israel and Jerusalem embodies the sense of hope that has always nurtured us as a people. The State of Israel attests to our strength to defy the pharaohs of the 20th century by our decision to become a visible – and vulnerable – member of the community of nations. The Jewish people refused to define itself as a persecuted victim. Instead we chose to build a homeland in a world where evil and violence continue to defile the human spirit. This courageous act shows that moral aspiration and hope can transcend the memory of suffering in shaping our destiny.

As in the past, so today, we cannot let the terrorists and the Assads of history become the focal points of our identity.

No one knows if suicide bombings will end or whether another madman will blow himself up in a crowded bus or pedestrian crossing. We are told there is no absolute security against maniac terrorists.

There is, however, one form of security which our enemies have never been able to destroy. It is our power to remember and to tell liberation stories; to pursue freedom and justice even from the margins of history; to sing "Next year in Jerusalem" in spite of insecurity and vulnerability.

We must never forget Egypt; we must never forget the Holocaust. But we must remember that what makes us Jews is the fact that Moses brought us to Sinai.

We must, as always, teach our children that Jewish identity is not defined by the memory of suffering but by the prophetic challenge to become a holy and just people - by our continuing to sing "Next year in Jerusalem."

Some notes on Pesach calendar

By the time you read this column, Pesach is about to arrive, and Christians will be celebrating their Passover.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

No, this is not a slip of the pen (alias computer keyboard), for "Passover" is indeed the holiday that Christians too will observe during our Pesach week. Better known as Easter in the English speaking world, the festival is almost everywhere else in the West known by a variant of the Hebrew pasach, to pass over, which recalls the biblical story of the angel who passed over the houses of the Israelites who identified themselves as the children of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob and readied themselves for the exodus from Egypt. Thus European languages speak of pasch, pask, paask, pascua, pasqua and, in French pâques. And to what does Easter (or, in German, Ostern) refer? To a long forgotten pagan goddess, Eoastra.

The early Christians still considered themselves as Jews and insisted on identifying the death-and-resurrection story with the observance of Pesach and observed their festival always at that time. Later on, a struggle developed within the Church between those who wanted to preserve their Jewish memory and those who wanted none of it. After some centuries, a compromise was reached and the observance of the Christian Passover was arranged to remember both the Jewish moon calendar and the Roman solar year.

We Jews of course continue to celebrate Pesach on the same day in our calendar, on the 15th day of Nissan (the first seder being observed the night before). To be sure, our calendar, being based on the revolutions of the moon around the earth, also pays attention to the solar year. For 12 revolutions of the moon would not quite add up to 365 days and therefore, in order to keep Pesach in the spring, we insert an extra month into our calendar to keep us au courant with the season. (The extra month, Adar II, is inserted seven times during a 19 year period). To repeat: in the Jewish year the date of Pesach always remains on the 15th of Nissan.

That's the way the first Christians too celebrated their Holy Week, but the above-noted compromise altered it in this fashion: Western Christians identify the first full moon after the spring equinox (this year April 4) and observe Easter on the Sunday following. Thus both the solar equinox and the lunar year are used in arranging this feast in the Christian calendar, which every year falls on a different day.

However, despite their origins, Pesach and Easter have little in common nowadays. For us, the festival recalls the beginnings of Israel as an independent, identifiable people, and the Haggadah recasts the biblical story into its familiar frame. It is a pity that so many families run through the text without comprehending its message and instead have their eyes fixed on the culinary feast.

Make sure that there is enough time to tell the tale and discuss its meaning. The gathering of family and friends is the frame of the celebration, but the focus must be on the story. It's a party all right, but a party to which God must be invited.

The Kirshner File

Buchanan's presidential bid attracted extremists

Pat Buchanan's presidential aspirations are dead in the water now that Bob Dole has mathematically clinched the Republican party's nomination. For a while, following his startling victories in the Louisiana caucus and in the New Hampshire primary, Buchanan's prospects seemed limitless. But in truth, he never really had a chance of wresting the glittering prize from Dole, being too far removed from the mainstream.

Never mind that Dole called him an extremist, or that Steve Forbes, yet another GOP aspirant who dropped out of the race, described him (and Louis Farrakhan) as "a dangerous" political force.

The most damaging blows to Buchanan's candidacy were in fact administered by two putative allies, the Christian Coalition, whose social views he upheld with untiring conviction, and Barry Goldwater, the 1964 Republican party nominee.

The Christian Coalition, whose endorsement he desperately sought, eventually backed Dole, though some of its members and sympathizers will stick with Buchanan to the bitter end. Buchanan has not withdrawn from the race. And Barry Goldwater, the grand old man of the Republican party who once proclaimed that "extremism in the defence of liberty is no vice," branded Buchanan's message as "fearful and decisive."

Buchanan, a right-wing populist who has been likened to George Wallace and Huey Long, is an xenophobic nationalist who articulates the fears, resentments and desires of an insular and perhaps nativist bloc of voters who want to outlaw abortion, bring prayer back to schools, limit legal immigration, jettison free trade and stop foreign aid.

Despite his stinging defeat at the hands of Dole, Buchanan was in no way a marginal candidate. As of last week, about one-quarter of Republican voters favored him over Dole. In the main, Buchanan appeals to Americans who have been "downsized" or who live in constant dread of being declared redundant.

Given the level of his popularity, Buchanan is anything but a spent force in U.S. politics. "Our time is coming, our time is coming," he crowed after all but conceding victory to Dole last month. This may be interpreted as a self-serving, face-saving statement. But let there be no doubt that Buchanan commands a constituency out there, and that he may yet upstage Dole at the Republican convention in San Diego in August. There is ample precedent for this. At the GOP convention in 1992, he embarrassed George Bush, the moderate Republican standard-bearer, by calling for "a cultural war" for the soul of the country.

Buchanan has a serious problem with Jewish concerns ranging from Israel to the issue of Nazi war criminals. Worse still, he has been accused of being an anti-Semite.

William Buckley, editor of the National Review, a leading conservative journal, has written that he cannot defend Buchanan from charges of anti-Semitism. (Lately, Buckley has backtracked).

Buchanan, who has described anti-Semitism as a form of pornography, has laughed off such accusations, while his campaign manager has said that Buchanan "rejects any kind of racism ..."

For the record, Buchanan rebuffed an endorsement from Russian rabble-rouser Vladimir Zhirinovsky (who labelled him "a brother in arms"), declared that he would maintain an open-door immigration policy for victims of persecution, and claimed that he has Jewish supporters (the most notable being an Orthodox Brooklyn rabbi named Yehuda Levin, who was one of the co-chairs of his presidential bid).

Even so, there is no denying that the whiff of anti-Semitism hovers over Buchanan, that anti-Semites consider him something of a role model and that several of his campaign workers were forced to quit when their white supremacist affiliations were disclosed.

Before we proceed any further, it should be clear that the comments for which he has been sharply criticized were expressed in the 1980s and early 1990s, before he ever plunged into the hurly-burly of national politics. However, it is true that an anti-Israel article — which blamed the Mossad for the death of President Bill Clinton's aide Vincent Foster — appeared on Buchanan's Internet site recently. But apart from this, Buchanan's record was remarkably free of anti-Israel or anti-Jewish innuendos in 1992, and this has been the case so far this year.

The same cannot be said of the period prior to and after the Gulf War, when passions were running high in the United States.

Shortly after Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990, Buchanan said that "only two groups are beating the drums for war in the Middle East — the Israeli defence ministry and its amen corner in the United States" (taken to mean American Jews).

And in a none-too-subtle ethnic slur, Buchanan stated that the war would be fought by "kids with names like McAllister, Murphy, Gonzales and Leroy Brown."

With the Gulf War over, Buchanan excoriated Israel as "a strategic albatros draped around the neck of the United States." This may have been a reference to Israel's passive role during the war, forced upon it by Washington.

Buchanan, who was apparently pro-Israel during the Cold War, has also criticized U.S. aid to Israel as "subsidizing a policy that denies to Palestinians that God-given right to a homeland;" denounced Israel's settlement policy in the territories as "illegal and unjust"; and railed against Israel's enlistment of an American citizen, Jonathan Jay Pollard, to spy against the United States.

In addition, Buchanan appears to have questioned the existence of gas chambers at Treblinka, has written that Holocaust survivors engage in "group fantasies of martyrdom and heroics," and has advocated the abolition of the Office of Special Investigations (the agency which hunts down suspected Nazi war criminals).

What is more, Buchanan rushed to the defence of two war criminals — German scientist Arthur Rudolph and Latvian concentration camp commandant Karl Linnas — and attacked the U.S. ostracism of Kurt Waldheim, the former president of Austria.

During this year's campaign, Buchanan was forced to dismiss several of his key operatives: Larry Pratt, who appeared at white supremacist meetings, and Kenny Knight and Bill Carter, who were connected with former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, now a Louisiana state senator.

These dismissals may have exonerated Buchanan of the libel that he knowingly consorts with fascists. But is it merely coincidental that figures from the far-right, including Jean Marie Le Pen of France, are drawn to Buchanan like moths to light, and that The Spotlight, a neo-Nazi periodical in the United States, has published excerpts from his newspaper columns, speeches and talk TV appearances?

Buchanan may not be a demagogue, but he comes awfully close to being one with his wink-and-nod invective. He should be reminded that "extremism in the defence of liberty" is definitely a vice.

Seeking to understand God's role in suffering

By RABBI KENNETH KATZ

Everyone has some suffering in their life. Why does God allow this? April 16 is Yom Hashoah, Holocaust Memorial Day. Remembering the Holocaust makes the problem of why God allows suffering especially poignant. What shall we say?

For some people, it is sufficient to say that God is God, and He has "all the cards." There is no point in questioning what God does. Other people say that the Holocaust and most suffering in the world is caused by human beings, and that the answer to suffering is for us to always be on guard to prevent future Holocausts, and to work hard to make the world more just, more safe, more healthy.

But what if these answers aren't good enough? What if our suffering, whether it's from the Holocaust or our personal misfortune, is too great to bear and no explanation gives us peace? What then can we say about suffering and God's role in suffering?

The Jewish tradition has two responses to suffering. One is the sort of response that I have been mentioning, a response that speaks to the mind, that tries to give reasons for why we suffer and why God allows us to suffer. But the other Jewish response to suffering is, I think, more powerful and perhaps the only true one; and that answer appeals to the heart, not the brain.

Our best Jewish response to suffering is to be there to console and help the sufferers, to go to a shivah house, to visit a hospital room, to organize ambulance services and medical research, to bring emotional and medical assistance as fast as possible to where it's needed the most. We may never be able to explain God's ways, though we continue to try; but perhaps the simple act of visiting a sick person or writing a cheque for medical research is better and more consoling than any explanation could be.

PART 1 OF 2

Exactly 10 years ago, the Council of Orthodox Rabbis of Toronto and B'nai Brith Canada formed a Holy coalition which successfully lobbied for the enactment of a law in Ontario, and later on at the federal level, designed to assist Jewish spouses in obtaining a religious divorce. Orthodox Rabbi Baruch Taub of Toronto inspired this coalition to act; Frank Dimant of B'Nai Brith quickly moved to help sponsor the legislation. Under Jewish law, a Jewish divorce can only be obtained with the consent of the other spouse and it cannot be imposed by the rabbis. A Jewish woman who fails to obtain a Jewish divorce is trapped. If she attempts a relationship which is "illicit" under Jewish law, even if she remarries under secular Canadian law, then any children of such a relationship would be considered bastards or mamzerim.

In Jewish law, mamzerim and their offspring — and their children's offspring to the tenth generation — can only marry other mamzerim or converts to Judaism. There are actual mamzerim associations all over the world — lost souls looking for each other other to marry as a result of some failure of an ancestor to obtain a proper Jewish divorce.

In addition, the Jewish woman is ostracized socially. If she is religious, she cannot even be seen alone with another man while she is still married, even though she may be separated from her spouse. However, even less ostensibly observant Jewish women are greatly concerned that one of their offspring or future descendants may become more observant and find it difficult to marry in a more observant synagogue or have children in the event that they do not obtain the Get.

Many spouses — often men — blackmail their partners by bargaining unfairly for property rights, access rights, or even custodial rights in exchange for their consent to the Get, and they have done so for several centuries. However, in modern times, as the authority of the Jewish religious courts has been diminished and their powers taken away by the secular state, their ability to punish such recalcitrant spouses has been extremely limited. Except for the power of social ostracization, it becomes difficult for Rabbis and community leaders to persuade someone to consent to a Get.

Cleaning for Pesach unearths a variety of past treasures

By JORDAN MAX
Special to The CJN

My thoughts of Pesach don't really begin until the first panic attack, which is usually precipitated when I first see the shelves at the supermarket converted to Pesach products before Purim has even started. Once my heart stops pounding and the tension headache subsides, like most families, we begin our Pesach planning and cleaning in earnest.

By far our biggest challenge is emptying out the pantry and freezer. When it comes to food taking up valuable storage space, we'd rather eat it than schlepp it. Although we still sell whatever chametz is left over, it is nice to be able to see the back of the freezer, at least once a year. I like to think of Pesach as the freezer's Yom Kippur, a chance to clear itself of past gastronomic and shopping sins.

The freezer's treasures of the deep usually provide more than a few surprises. Our freezer's contents are a testimony to failed plans, marital miscommunications (I thought you said we were out of pita), weekly specials and other ideas whose time has passed. So far I have discovered 10 half-loaves of challah (French toast here we come), lots of frozen over-ripe bananas (banana bread ad nauseum), children's toys (don't even ask), four cooked pullets, chicken bones (from an overzealous nanny), endless bags of bread ends (waiting for bread crumbs, no doubt), and a dozen really bad bran muffins (well, I liked them). Needless to say, the microwave oven is about to get a real workout.

As for the pantry, we're getting a little better. In our younger days, sans children, and therefore sans day school fees, our lives were relatively carefree, our funds more available. As a result, much take-out food was consumed, particularly in baked goods. We would typically buy new boxes of sugar, salt and spices for Pesach and barely get through half of them before Pesach was coming again and we needed a fresh box. We used to think that we were destined to leave to our children an estate of 50 half-empty boxes of sugar and salt.

Kosher products found in the pantry

Happily, one of the side effects of having children has been more home baking. Our oldest son no longer asks the embarrassing question "What goodies did you buy for Shabbat?" nearly as frequently.

However, more than a few weekly specials, child-selected pastas and new kosher products still find their way to the back of the pantry, only to emerge into the cold light of day a week before Pesach begins. This gives rise to my first rule of the kitchen. The utility of a food product is inversely proportional to its distance from the front of the shelf.

There are two responses to this unintentional stockpiling. The first is to practise carbohydrate-loading, just like marathon athletes do prior to the big race, albeit for a whole month. After all, isn't Pesach cleaning a marathon itself? Or perhaps it's a subconscious attempt to build up an overexposure to chametz so you won't actually miss it on Pesach. This is similar to people who work in chocolate factories being initially allowed to eat unlimited amounts of chocolate, so that after a while they don't want to even go near the stuff.

The second response to chametz stockpiling is a proliferation of faux nouvelle cuisine, which is truly international in scope if nothing else. When you're desperately trying to finish off what's left in the pantry, refrigerator and freezer, who's to say that you can't eat kugel with hoisin sauce, chicken with frozen raspberries or spaghetti with canned salmon and baked beans? Aside from kashrut considerations, the gastronomic possibilities are endless, if not gastrointestinal.

These culinary creations are the ultimate challenge for any cook, equivalent to the proverbial engineering project of constructing a satellite out of some tin foil, rubber bands, juice cartons and a bicycle tire. We just tell the kids it's nouvelle cuisine like they serve in fancy restaurants.

Better yet, think of these combinations as a culinary warm-up to Pesach or the start to a new cookbook, Pre-Pesach Quease-ine. And by the way, does anybody know what to do with a whole pound of chili peppers?

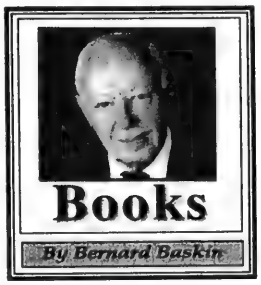
Knowledge, passion combined



God Was Not In The Fire: The Search for a Spiritual Judaism by Daniel Gordis Scribner $30.00

The famous Elijah Gaon of Vilna — one of the great spiritual leaders of 19th century East European Jewry — was once asked a strange question. If he were to receive infallible religious instruction from an angel would he accept it? The rabbi replied that he would refuse, because faith achieves greater meaning and satisfaction when one struggles to find it for oneself.

For Daniel Gordis, dean of the University of Judaism in Los Angeles, the quest for faith and identity involves unending struggle and honest searching. Jews are called "children of Israel" after a renamed Jacob who wrestled with God. Our tradition requires from us more than quiet acceptance or mere subservience; it validates our intellectual and spiritual struggles for increased meaning — and encourages us to never give them up.

Combining knowledge with passion, the author involves the reader in a step by step investigation of five major areas of Judaism: ritual, prayer, study, mitzvah and ethics.

Judaism, asserts Gordis, focuses more on "relationship with God" than on belief in God. "While some Christian communities urge their followers, 'Believe, and you will be saved,' Judaism's rough equivalent is 'Search, and you will find meaning.' Most of Jewish tradition decided long ago to focus not on His essence, but on God's presence; Judaism seeks not God's truth, but God's closeness."

For the author, the Jewish spiritual odyssey is not about blind or unquestioning faith. It celebrates the mind and the soul, and even reaches out towards the skeptic. But it also asks the skeptic to give Judaism a chance, "to live fully, to participate in the richness that Jewish life has to offer."

In a chapter devoted to ethics in Judaism, the author maintains that ethics and spirituality are indivisible. As Isaiah taught "the Holy God is hallowed by righteousness." Ethics offer not only a unique means of improving the world, but intellectually sophisticated and spiritually satisfying means of adding depth, consequence and meaning to the relationships that make up the world in which we live.

Above all, there must be the recognition that there is no easy formula to the difficult and persistent problems that Jews face in modern society. Answers are not provided from heaven.

Gordis analyzes a passage from the Talmud in which Rabbi Eliezer and other sages are having a spirited debate. A Heavenly Voice cries out, "Why are you disputing with Rabbi Eliezer seeing that in all matters the law agrees with him?" But Rabbi Joshua arose and exclaimed: "The law is not in Heaven." (Deuteronomy, 30:12) What did he mean by this?

Said Rabbi Jeremiah, "The Torah has already been given at Mt. Sinai; we pay no attention to a Heavenly Voice, because You wrote long ago in the Torah, 'After a majority one must incline.' " (Exodus 23:2)

Rabbi Nathan met Elijah hence and asked: "What did God do in that hour?" Elijah replied, "He laughed [with joy] saying, 'My children have defeated Me, My children have defeated Me.' "

God's acquiescence with this apparent chutzpah seems to indicate that God accepts human input in reaching vital religious decisions.

The author is a splendid teacher and this simply written work teaches the reader — pious or impious, learned or uninformed — how to approach and find new meaning in Jewish thought and observance.

A valuable addition to the text is an annotated selection of books for further reading and an index of primary sources.

Author discusses the way religious practices transmitted

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Dr. Haim Soloveitchik, author of an influential essay on modern Jewish Orthodoxy that appeared in Tradition magazine in 1994, discussed his essay in Toronto recently before a large gathering at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

The lecture, like the essay upon which it was based, was entitled Rupture and Reconstruction: The Transformation of Contemporary Jewry.

Religious practice in such essential matters as the laws of kashrut and how to keep a Jewish kitchen is passed down by mimetic tradition, not through any textual authorities, Soloveitchik said. Even the most well-used handbooks of Jewish religious practice, such as the Shulchan Aruch, do not lay out basic procedures from scratch; rather they are problem-solving guides that presume their readers know all the basics, he said.

"The Shulchan Aruch doesn't mention the need for separate milchig and fleischig dishes, never mind all the tablecloths and cutlery and napkins," he said. "There's no way you could run a Jewish kitchen by any form of book learning ... Much of Jewish practice was transmitted the same way that kitchen practice was transmitted – simply by seeing and doing."

In probing the reason behind the increasing number of humras (stringent new religious laws) that are part of modern religious life, Soloveitchik said immigration, the Holocaust and other elements have weakened the formative influence of the home.

"There has been a rupture in the way that religious practice is transmitted," noted the professor of Jewish law, history and literature at New York's Yeshiva University. "The rupture usually doesn't occur in the homes of the immigrant generation, nor in their children's homes, he said. Rather, it takes place in the third and fourth generations, once individuals have been assimilated and acculturized with the host society.

"There's been a complete revolution of religious practice because received practice no longer transmits the sense of being authentic," he said.

"The practice has become destabilized. Habit used to validate in a previous generation, but it no longer validates. People turn now to texts to find out what is right. Home is no longer the authority."

Because the synagogue had made copies of Soloveitchik's 66-page essay available two weeks before his appearance as well as at the door, there were many detailed questions and comments following the talk.

The lecture was sponsored jointly by The Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University and the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

Computer whiz blasts CRTC's ties to industry

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Welcome to the brave new world of computer-dominated technology, a world of artificial intelligence, Internet access and virtual information managers.

Confused by the terminology and the technology? Well, if you have trouble programming your VCR, the years ahead should prove interesting indeed.

Proponents of the new information technology predict the widespread use of computers will be made easier than ever before with the introduction of artificial intelligence computers. These machines will serve as information managers, acting as a sort of gatekeeper/interface between you and powerful computers accessed through your telephone or cable lines.

While the onward march of new technologies seems inevitable, there are those who, fully versed in computers, are stepping back and saying, slow down, where is this technology taking us?

Jesse Hirsh is one of those asking that question. A self-taught computer whiz and a student of communications in the University of Toronto's McLuhan program, he's been touted as a candidate for one of eight commissioner positions becoming vacant at the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) this June.

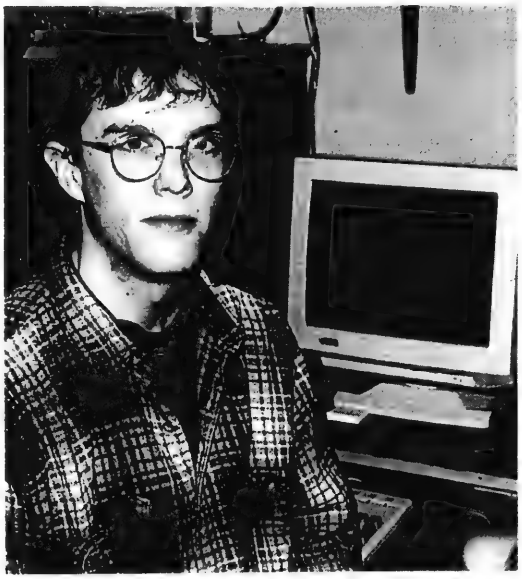
A number of public interest groups, including the Alliance for a Connected Canada, of which he is a member, are pushing Hirsh, 21, and others unconnected with big business or government for the soon-to-be-vacant CRTC seats. A longshot at best to be appointed, Hirsh relishes the opportunity such a position would offer to question the executives and information managers of major telephone, computer and cable corporations who are working to revolutionize the way society obtains and uses information.

"One of the main beefs these public interest groups have is the domination of [the information highway by] the private sector and large companies," Hirsh said. "This is something that is going to affect all elements of society and they are concerned the public interest is not being addressed."

A grassroots movement including educational groups, small business associations and consumer advocates is attempting to obtain some say in determining the directions of the new technologies.

One of the proposals being advanced by telephone companies that causes Hirsh concern would see a charge levied for every call made. That would make use of telephones prohibitively expensive for many people, he argued.

Another area of concern for Hirsh is the headlong rush towards the introduction of powerful computer networks using artificial intelligence that will collect your mail, do spreadsheets, suggest movies to watch — do everything your personal computer currently does and much more, because it will be hooked up through telephone or cable lines to outside mega-computers.



Jesse Hirsh

Not only does this raise questions about privacy, but the new technologies will also change the way society communicates. "Our concern is that it's a runaway train and there are no brakes on it," Hirsh said.

"I'm not trying to be a Luddite and say this technology is bad. I think a lot of it is good, but I don't think the solution is to blindly push it through."

In his address to a CRTC regional hearing in Toronto last February, Hirsh's language was more radical, similar to that found in his essays, which are posted on the The Anarchives (see below).

"The CRTC has consistently demonstrated their position as being in the 'back pocket of the phone companies' " he said. "It is not unreasonable to suggest that if the established authorities, in this case the CRTC, do not meet the [democratic] interests of the public, the public will take the technology into their own hands."

Hirsh is currently a junior partner at Local GlobalAccess, a Toronto company that provides Internet access, training, seminars, consultation and network development.

His essays on communications and society can be accessed at: http://www.lglobal.com/TAO/Anarchives.

Kibbutz program heightens teens' Jewish identity

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It takes a certain type of kid to leave home and family at the age of 15 or 16 to go for a year-long kibbutz work-study program.

And it takes a certain type of educator to dream up and run such a program.

Amichai Yarchi, former principal of the high school at Kibbutz Beit Hashita in the Jezreel Valley, set up the America-Israel High School Program in 1985 for Grade 11 students from North America.

Noah Stoffman

The youngsters live in dorms, spend five days a week in class, work one full day on the kibbutz and participate in hiking and camping trips throughout Israel. They are "adopted" by kibbutz families and celebrate Shabbat and holidays as a group.

A sister program for Grade 10, established 25 years ago at Kibbutz Kfar Blum, has amalgamated with the Grade 11 program and is also based at Beit Hashita.

"The students have to be mature enough to be independent for a year, not only for fun but for daily work," said Yarchi during a recent visit to Toronto, part of a North American tour during which he also stopped in Vancouver

Parents, in turn, need confidence in Israel, in their child and in Yarchi himself, he added. "If either child or parent is not confident enough, it's not going to work."

But the program, which has 26 students this year, works very well, according to alumni who speak glowingly of their year.

Of the seven percent who don't complete the program, most leave because of discipline problems, Yarchi said. "I give them many chances to learn from their mistakes. If they show signs that they are learning, I accept a period of adjustment."

Yarchi turns a third of applicants down, based on interviews, references and academic records. Qualified students are not turned down for financial reasons, he said.

Yarchi calls the $8,150 (US) fee for one year's tuition, room and board "an investment."

He began thinking seriously about the program as a Washington-based shaliach for the World Zionist Organization in the early 1980s.

"I felt a strong need as a Jew to look for different ways to strengthen Jewish identity, especially among young American and Canadian Jews," he said. He also wanted "to introduce another kind of Judaism to Israeli teenagers," he said.

A hands-on principal and teacher, he won't ask anything of his students he wouldn't do himself. "I don't tell them, 'You should do this.' We do it together. I try to establish friendship and still maintain my authority."

Noah Stoffman, a 19-year-old University of Toronto student, recalls that during his year at Beit Hashita (1993-94), Yarchi once disciplined him and his roommate by having them swim lengths at 6 a.m. "He got in and did lengths with us. At every point he was our leader and our principal, but he was also there with us."

Amichai Yarchi

Yarchi works at instilling values like responsibility, modesty, honesty and loyalty. "If they lie to me, they're in trouble," he said.

In 1992, on the recommendation of a former student, Yarchi received an award from the University of Chicago for "outstanding and inspiring" high school teachers.

"The thing that really makes this program different is that the education comes from so much more than what we learn in class," said Stoffman.

"Every day they have to make choices — whether to go to school, whether to do homework — and there are no parents behind them to tell them what to do," said Yarchi.

It was an adjustment, initially, to return to Canada, Stoffman admitted.

But the year away was "completely unparalleled, [with] the kind of little experiences that affect your understanding of what it is to be a Jew, to be a Zionist and to be you."

Shlork! Toronto inker gives weight to superheroes

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shlork! Krakk! Kzaaat!! Raahhrr!!!

Rest easy CJN readers. Multiple disturbances in the timestream connected spacially to chronal energy patterns have temporarily linked you to the 30th century. Here, teenage superheroes with an attitude, wearing membrane-thin super outfits, engage in life and death struggles against monstrous supervillains bent on destruction, domination, deviousness and just plain mayhem.

Employing their various super powers, Brainiac 5, Cosmic Boy, Saturn Girl, Shrinking Violet, Triad and Chameleon — members of the Legion of Super-Heroes — do battle to keep the world safe for ... good causes.

Yes, timestream travellers of the 20th century, the Legion lives on in monthly comic books whose artwork and storylines keep the club current with modern comic-readers' sensibilities.

Eeeyyyoowwww!!! Superboy has even shed his red cape in favor of a black leather jacket and designer sunglasses that owe more to Queen Street than to Smallville.

Back in the 20th century, humanoid bi-ped Ron Boyd has worked diligently for the past four chronal units (years) as inker for the Legion of Super-Heroes comic book. It's his task to take the pencilled drawings sent to him and finish the artwork prior to coloring.

"I tighten up the look, give the characters weight, create a foreground, background and add the lighting and texture," he said. Those elements have all been suggested by the penciller, "but to render it as a finished product is my job."

Ron Boyd

Working in his midtown Toronto home, far from the Phantom Zone, Boyd uses brushes, dipped pens and specialized architectural pens to give the drawings weight and texture.

He's part of a continent-wide team that produces the popular Legion comic book every month.

About 45,000 copies of the Legion book are sold worldwide each month and surprisingly, the majority of readers are in the 20 to 45 age group, though clearly it also appeals to those not quite so chronologically challenged.

Like many of his generation, Boyd, 31, grew up reading comics — though in his case they were mostly Spiderman adventures, produced by DC's arch-rival, Marvel.

A graduate of the fine arts program at York University, Boyd majored in film production and worked in that industry for some time until he got fed up with "the big egos and one-upsmanship" common in the business.

Working with Stuart Immonen, Boyd's introduction to the world of comics came when he self-published a book called Headcheese, an anthology of short stories they had written and drawn.

He later produced some sample inking and sent them to Marvel in New York. Eventually he was given some inking work for Kid 'n Play, a book about an urban rap group.

From there, he went on to DC's Legion.

Even as a kid, Boyd, who attended Associated Hebrew Schools, was attracted to "the sidebar stuff" in Spiderman comics. "I was fascinated by Peter Parker (Spiderman's alter ego), the misfit who had trouble in the world," his sense of responsibility and awkwardness.

Most of his personal interest in comics centred on the non-super hero genre. Dark Horse Comics, for one, produced Sin City, a gritty, hard-boiled detective comic that resembles cinema's film noir.

Will Eisner, author of the 1940s classic, The Spirit, is the exemplar of comics writing, he believes, and the elderly Eisner recently published a "slice of life" work about growing up a Jew in the tenements of east side New York.

(Interestingly enough, Jews have been prominent at DC comics from the very beginning. Superman was created by Jerry Siegel and former Torontonian Joe Shuster. There's even a Jewish member of the Legion — Leviathan, who was once known as Colossal Boy.)

"Comics are a limitless medium for storytelling" and are seen that way in Europe, Boyd says. In North America, however, they're viewed as cartoonish, escapist literature.

But Art Spigelman's Maus, which followed the lives of Jews living under the Nazis, is an example of gritty comics that have heart, he adds.

There are even some life lessons to be learned from the Legion, Boyd believes. "It's about holding their powers in check, acting responsibly ... Younger readers don't just want a testosterone punch, they want a morality tale hidden in the tale with the wham, bang."

Passover message from CJC president Hershon

As we prepare for Passover and the first seder, it is vital for us to remember that this Festival of Freedom is all about one of the paramount events in Jewish history: the Exodus of Jews from Egypt, which led to the birth of the Jewish nation.

Goldie Hershon

While the story of Passover dates back more than 3,000 years, it is important that we never forget the escape of the Jewish people from treacherous conditions in Egypt. Some might not agree, but I believe that we are fortunate to be living in interesting times. The conditions which existed when Pharaoh issued the cruelest of laws towards Jews are fortunately long gone. We have a strong State of Israel and a devoted Diaspora leadership to thank for that.

However, we must remember that it was only a few years ago that the gates of the former Soviet Union flew open and Jews there were permitted free emigration to Israel. The same can be said for Ethiopia and Syria.

In Israel, our brothers and sisters face challenges. It is incumbent upon us in the Diaspora to support them by being a united community standing firmly behind the only truly democratic country in the entire region. If we live as proud Jews today, it is no doubt due in very large part to what Israel has done for us. We owe a tremendous debt.

Domestically, we are working very hard towards the promotion of a united Canada. Incidents of racism and anti-Semitism continue to trouble us, while the dosier dealing with the prosecution of Nazi war criminals has not achieved the necessary results at a time when both suspects and witnesses are getting older and even dying.

As you sit down at the seder table on April 3, think about the past, concern yourself with the present and help us work towards a strong Jewish presence with its hallmark of justice and morality in Canada and around the world in the days, months and years to come.

Congregation's Aron Kodesh incorporates old and new

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Of necessity, the new Aron Kodesh built for Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, a 10-year-old egalitarian congregation, is portable.

Every Shabbat, the ark is taken from storage and rolled on small but sturdy hidden casters into the library/board room the congregation rents at the Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue.

Because High Holy Day services are held at larger premises, architect/Kehilla member George Friedman was asked to design a piece which could be transported easily by car. The ark consists of two separate pieces, the Aron itself to house the congregation's three Torahs, and a base which also provides storage.

Coincidentally, the oldest arks were also portable, Friedman learned when researching the subject.

Ancient arks were made of the richest materials because "the closer you get to the word of God, the more precious it is," he said.

The Kehilla's ark is made of solid cherry, handpicked by cabinetmaker Henry Rose for its grain pattern and rich color variances.

The light reddish wood has been called "the North American version of mahogany, [which is] considered the perfect furniture wood," said Rose.

A collaborative effort, the new ark reflects the work of three local Jewish artisans: Rose, wood carver Siggi Buhler and fabric artist Rochelle Rubinstein Kaplan, who hand-painted and embroidered the silk parochet.

Both the parochet and the wooden ark bear the words — HaTorah, HaAvodah, Gemilut Chasadim (Torah, worship, acts of loving kindness) — the three principles on which the world is based, according to Pirke Avot.

"The idea was to incorporate some text which represents the aspirations of this group," said Friedman, who also served as a member of the four-person design committee.

The words are seen through long rectangular windows cut out of each door. They remain visible when the doors are opened.

"The committee didn't want the words to disappear when you open the doors," said Friedman.

"A lot of the service takes place with the doors open," added Rose.

Carved into the ark and its base is a stylized tree of life with 12 circles, each slightly different, to represent both the 12 tribes of Israel and the diverse members of the 50-family shul community.

The Kehilla's investment in the ark is a statement of the congregation's viability, according to Gary Farb, who chairs the board of directors. Because there is no spiritual leader, decisions are made collectively.

Scientists may have secret to ancient blue dye

Bid them that they make them fringes in the corners of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of each corner a thread of blue (p'til techelet) . . . that you may look upon it and remember all the commandments of the L-rd. (Numbers 15:37-41)

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For over 1,300 years, the secret of techelet, the blue dye that was used, not only for Jewish ritual, but by royalty and priests all over the ancient Mediterranean world, was lost.

This blue dye, explained Dr. Baruch Sterman in a speech at B'nai Torah Congregation sponsored by Mizrachi of Canada, was so rare that it was worth 20 times its weight in gold.

"Wars were fought over it, such as the one between the prophetess Devorah and her general Barak and Sisera," Sterman said, quoting the hope of Sisera's mother that "he will bring back booty of the dyed fabric."

So rare was the dye that the Roman Empire passed laws that Jews not only couldn't wear it, but couldn't even be part of the industry, Sterman said.

In 650 CE, when the Arabs conquered what had been the Roman province of Judea, they destroyed the factories which produced techelet and the process was lost to history.

According to tradition, the techelet had to come from a creature called a hillazon, a term which in itself has given rise to arguments among scholars. What was agreed was that it had a shell, the dye had to be taken from it when it was alive, it produced a sky-blue color on fabric and it had a body that looked like the sea.

In the mid-19th century, Sterman said, Rabbi Gershon Leiner, the Radzyner Rebbe, decided that a type of squid, when its ink is changed chemically from black to blue, was the source of the techelet, and opened a factory which produced the colored threads for his followers, who still follow his ruling.

Mounds of snail skeletons

Rabbi Isaac Herzog, later the first Chief Rabbi of the State of Israel, disagreed and determined that the hillazon is actually a type of snail, murex trunculus.

Sterman said he and a small group of young, Orthodox scientists managed to prove that murex trunculus in fact fits all the criteria: mounds of crushed skeletons of this snail were found at sites of old factories in the north of Israel, giving the theory historical authenticity; in the sea, it is virtually indistinguishable from its surroundings; and its ink is photosensitive, so that when the sun shines on it it turns sky blue.

He and his friends became determined to manufacture techelet. As the snails were protected by law in Israel, he made pilgrimages to Greece and Spain, where they are a popular food.

"My main purpose is to make it available to the world," Sterman said, adding that they don't solicit either orders or rabbinical opinions as to its validity.

Sterman, Joel Guberman, Ari Greenspan and Rabbi Eliahu Tebger, who has written scholarly works on the use of the blue threads and has recreated the manufacturing process according to halachic criteria, have established the non-profit P'til Tekhelet Foundation, to produce techelet, and to promote research and educational projects.

Mizrachi of Canada is selling kits with the coveted blue thread. The kits also include instructions for weaving it into the fringes of a tallit katan and of a regular tallit.

It is not surprising that Mizrachi, the religious Zionist organization, should be involved with techelet. The resurgence of interest in it by Rabbi Leiner was inspired by the growing belief in the possibility of a return to Zion and the associated fulfilment of religious law.

A tale of two wise men

Two wise men of Chelm went out for a walk, when suddenly it began to rain.

"Quick", said one man. "Open your umbrella."

"It won't help," said his friend. "My umbrella is full of holes."

"Then why did you bring it in the first place?"

"I didn't think it would rain!"

March OF THE LIVING ready for emotional journey

The applications, interviews, information sessions and seminars are over, and now, all that remains is the march itself.

On April 14, 300 high school students from across Canada - 112 from Ontario - will join thousands of other youth from around the world on the March of the Living.

The UJA Federation funded project involves a 3 kilometre march from Auschwitz to Birkenau, paying tribute along the way to victims of the Holocaust. Participants will also visit historic Jewish sites in Warsaw, Cracow and Lublin, Poland as they mark Yom Hashoa. The second half of the trip will be spent in Israel, celebrating Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut, and learning about the country.

Preparations for the two week tour, which began last November, included interviews, information sessions, a series of educational programs and a weekend at Maple Lake, near Parry Sound. So, it was an emotional day when Toronto participants and their parents gathered recently for the final orientation meeting.

"We really wanted them to know as much as possible about what they were going to see in order to enhance their experience," explains March of the Living co-chair Barbara Bank, who will be making the trip with her daughter Hannah.

Aaron Weinstein from London Ontario decided to go on the March of the Living as a way of getting in touch with his past. "It could have been my family," says Weinstein, who is looking forward to sharing the experience with others his age.

Alana Samson hopes the trip will allow her to "bridge the gap between generations" so that she can have a better understanding of what her parents, both child survivors, went through.

Marci Greenwald is determined to transmit her experiences to her peers. "It's important," she believes, "that each generation passes on this information to the next one."

Benny Bensimon is proud his son took the initiative to go on the march. "Every young Jew must learn about this important part of our history. We support him completely."

Three of the group's chaperones, Anita Ekstein, Henry Melnick and Roman Ziegler, are survivors. "These young people are the future standard bearers," observes Ziegler, who has been speaking to students about his experiences during the Holocaust for the past 13 years. "It is up to them to carry on the legacy."

March co-chair Roz Davidson has wanted to make the trip for a long time. "This," she says, "will deepen their understanding of the entire tragedy and hopefully it will have a major impact on them."

Wise guys! Nati Wise and his father Dr. Shelly Wise will share their experiences on the March of the Living.

The looks on their faces say it all. Zena Haberman (L), Marci Greenwald (middle) and Shauna Greenspan had a great time at the March of the Living Shabbaton at Maple Lake.

GENEROUS SUPPORT FOR VICTIMS FUND

Toronto's Jewish community has collected over $20,000 to date to aid the families of terror attack victims in Israel.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto created the fund in response to hundreds of phone calls from people who wanted to demonstrate solidarity.

"I'm really pleased at how quickly the community pulled together," said Dr. Harry Krakowsky, co-chair of UJA's Community Cabinet.

The proceeds will be distributed to victims and their families by United Israel Appeal. Anyone wishing to make a donation can call (416) 631-5709 or mail a donation to the Victim Support Fund, United Jewish Appeal, 4600 Bathurst Street, 5th floor, North York Ontario., M2R 3V2.

UJA conference dazzles young leaders

Recently, 32 Toronto delegates joined 3000 North American participants for UJA's Young Leadership Conference in Washington. The convention featured speeches by President Bill Clinton and the late Prime Minister Yitzak Rabin's daughter, Dalia Rabin Pelossof. One of the young leaders attending the conference was David Burstein, who provided his personal perspective for Community Matters.

The conference, with it's theme "Capital to Capital," was an intense three day session containing special moments that could even be described as life changing.

Before the conference began, members of the Canadian delegation visited the Holocaust Memorial Museum. Then, the 32 Toronto participants were exposed to a diverse array of topics and brilliant speakers from all areas of Jewish life.

There were 50 breakout sessions on subjects such as preparing for a seder, raising Jewish children, finding the holy in the mundane, Jewish medical ethics, kabalah, intermarriage, the synagogue, affirmative action, Israeli politics, the peace process and Islamic fundamentalism. There was so much to choose from and not enough time to get around to all the topics of interest.

A recurring conference theme was encouragement for delegates to use their freedom and power to make themselves better people, responsible citizens, and committed Jews.

For many, merely experiencing the energy of 3000 like minded individuals was overwhelming. But one of the really great aspects of the conference was the feeling that relationships being built could last a lifetime. The late night schmoozing and games of Jewish geography were not only fun, they added to the sense of "klal Yisrael."

President Clinton stole the show and captured the hearts of thousands at UJA's Young Leadership Conference in Washington. Photo by Sheldon Nadal.

While each delegate took home important individual memories, there were a few shared moments that won't soon be forgotten.

A speech by President Clinton highlighted the opening night. After receiving a 5 minute standing ovation, Clinton charmed the crowd by wishing 3000 Jews a happy St. Patrick's Day. The excitement of actually seeing the President energized the entire conference.

On the final day of the conference, delegates went up to Capitol Hill to meet members of Congress and relay issues of concern to American Jewry.

In the last plenary, the Nachshon award was presented to Dalia Rabin Pelossof, Yitzhak Rabin's daughter, as a tribute to the life and legacy of her father. In accepting the award, named after the first Jew to jump into the Red Sea as the Egyptians chased the Jewish people, Mrs. Rabin Pelossof read a poem that had been sent to her family after her father was murdered. After reading the poem, Just 3 Bullets, we were shocked to learn that the author, 15 year old Bat-Hen Shahak, was killed in the Tel Aviv suicide bombing on March 4. It was a transcendent moment. There wasn't a dry eye in the room.

CONTINUITY GRANTS: ROUND TWO

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is looking for the perfect Jewish project without any money to move it beyond the drawing board.

A new call for grant applications has been issued by the Action Committee for Jewish Continuity (ACJC), which is prepared to fund its second series of projects.

Last year, the committee awarded $100,000 in grants for diverse endeavours from parent-teen dialogue to the Yiddishland Cafe. This time, up to $170,000 is available.

Two $25,000 grants will be issued for major new initiatives, along with three $15,000 awards, primarily designed for projects sponsored by two or more groups. There are, in addition, six $7500 grants, and twelve $2500 grants for those who have not previously received community funding.

"Genuine Jewish continuity requires ongoing commitment and a continuous stream of innovative ventures," said committee chairman Les Klein. "That's why we're so proud to announce this second round of grants."

In order to be eligible, a proposed project must be Jewish in content and scheduled for completion by the end of 1997. Priority will be given to projects sponsored by more than one group. The deadline for applications is May 31.

For more information or an application, call ACJC director Susan Jackson at (416) 631-5681.

Mission 3000's Protestant volunteer veteran

Done it. Only a few Toronto non-Jews can say that about Israeli army service. Charles Presley can.

The 71 year old son of a Pentecostal minister was a friendly fixture on Mission 3000's bus 21 - one of 25 buses that criss-crossed Israel with over 1100 participants on board.

Chic Presley poses in front of Beit Shean's archaelogical ruins.

Presley, affectionately nicknamed "Chic," was on his sixth trip to Israel, but it was the first time he could simply sit back and relax. On all the other visits, he was folding blankets or polishing army trucks as a Volunteer for Israel participant. "I was cleaning M16's and Uzi's during the Gulf War," he proudly pointed out.

Presley first discovered Volunteers for Israel in a newspaper ad, when he was 66 and promptly contacted the organization. "I was the first Protestant to apply," he said.

As a former navy man, Presley was well attuned to the army work he was asked to do, but Hebrew is something he still can't master. However, he doesn't consider his lack of language a barrier to both assisting and enjoying the country.

For Chic Presley, Mission 3000, sponsored by UJA Federation and United Israel Appeal of Canada, was certainly sheer enjoyment. "As a volunteer, I saw Israel from the inside out. Now I'm seeing it from the outside in," he explained. "On my other visits, I got more of a sense of belonging and helping the country. This time, I think I'm getting something back."

Although what Presley describes as his "strong feelings" for Israel were nurtured by his father, his love for the country seems to come naturally, especially when he talks about Jerusalem.

"The old city and the history of the Jewish people are hypnotic," he said. "That's what prompted me to come to Israel."

Personal reflections from a crumbling capital

By Elliot Halperin

I recently returned from a four day visit to the Ukrainian capital of Kiev for a Federation UJA professional development mission. Once a centre of Jewish religious and cultural life, today, Kiev is best characterized as a frontier Jewish community in distress. The estimated 470,000 Jews living in Ukraine have been separated from their Jewish roots for 70 years of Communist rule and are only now beginning to discover their heritage.

In the last 6 years, a rebirth of Ukrainian Jewish life appears out of the shadows of Babi Yar, where more than 30,000 Jews were shot to death by the Nazis over 50 years ago. Yet, thousands of Jews, young and old, are preparing to make aliyah in the coming months.

I visited a class of teenagers who, several times a week, come together to learn Hebrew and prepare for life in a new country. These kids actually choose to leave their parents for two years to take advantage of the exceptional, UJA Federation supported Naaleh 16 program. The vast majority of them remain in Israel after graduation from high school and most of their families will join them at a later date.

On the surface, these children appear to be learning Hebrew much the way any class of teenagers would. However, what they are really learning is how to be Jewish by being introduced to the stories, legends and traditions that most Jews take for granted.

The story that they will tell their children will sound much like a modern day version of the exodus from Egypt. This year alone, through UJA Federation funding, 20,000 Jews will leave Ukraine along with its crumbling infrastructure, insufficient food and inadequate shelter. They will arrive in Israel with a strong feeling of belonging to the Jewish people and dreams of a brighter future.

For those who remain, largely the elderly, life will continue to be difficult. There is hardly an older Ukrainian Jew without a constant feeling of hunger, compounded in the winter, by the absence of heating and electricity. They receive a monthly government pension equivalent to $12 U.S. Without the food boxes provided by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, they would suffer from serious malnutrition.

As I looked into the face of one elderly woman, I could not help but be reminded of my own grandmother who escaped Poland in the 1930s. Had she not left in time, her chances for survival would have been slim and her life would have been so different.

Holocaust memorial spans generations

This year's Yom Hashoah commemoration, April 14, will be bringing three generations together. That's the theme of the community gathering sponsored by the UJA Federation's Holocaust Rememberance Committee. Eileen Thalenberg, Allan Farkas and Michael Lebovic, all children of survivors, will be reading poems and other Holocaust writings.

"Survivors can be secure that they and the millions of Jews who died during the Holocaust will not be forgetten," says Anna Lerner, co-chair of this year's event. "Their legacy has been passed on to the second generation and we will pass it on to our children."

Lerner is pleased to see how "dedicated and committed" the second generation is to educating the community and remembering the horrors of the darkest period in Jewish history. "We have an obligation to make sure millions of Jews didn't die in vain," she says.

Also scheduled is a video presentation depicting Jewish life in Europe before the Holocaust and the birth of Israel. "We want to show people what we lost and what we've gained back," explains Lerner. "It's a way of bridging the past to the present."

The program will include a candle lighting ceremony and a keynote address by Israel's Consul General Jehudi Kinar.

The commemorative service will be held at 2 p.m. on Sunday, April 14 at Pride of Israel Synagogue, 59 Lissom Crescent at Bathurst St. For more information call (416) 635-2883 ext. 144.

Three generations say "never again." This year's Yom Hashoah Commerative service will take place on April 14 at Pride of Israel Synagogue.

Bloor JCC assists Rwandan relief

BloorJCC

April 6, 1994 was Rwanda's day of infamy, the day when one of the world's most stunning human disasters started.

After war erupted in Rwanda, more than a million people died and hundreds of thousands were wounded or left homeless. Many of them are orphaned children.

This year, on April 27, nearly two years after the Rwandan nightmare began, the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, a UJA Federation agency, is hosting a fundraising art auction to aid Rwanda's children.

Children of the Earth: Struggles, Hopes and Dreams is being organized by Hope for Rwanda's Children Fund. The event includes:

- A preview viewing of art for auction, with wine and cheese, from 5:30-7:30 p.m.
- Program of the Spoken Word, 7:30-8:15, highlighting original readings from the evening's guest speakers
- The auction itself at 8:15, featuring dozens of excellent donated works
- Sale of Rwandan sculpture and handicrafts following the auction.

Event proceeds will be placed in a scholarship program to provide school books, supplies and tuition for Rwandan children and to assist other relief efforts.

"The atrocities in Rwanda have created one of the greatest aid crises in history," explained Fund president Shyrna Gilbert.

Admission to Children of the Earth: Struggles, Hopes and Dreams is $10. For more information, contact Shyrna Gilbert at (416) 609-9375 or Bloor JCC at (416) 924-6211.

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TOGETHER 1996 UJA WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

New women's leaders display deep commitment

The UJA Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) installed their new leaders last week in what could better be described as a comfortable transition than a changing of the guard.

Vicki Campbell, Vice Chair of the Women's Campaign last year, succeeded Marlene Axmith at the top spot, and Jill Reitman, one of last year's JWF Vice Presidents assumed the organization's leadership. Jewish Women's Federation unites virtually all of the city's Jewish women's organtions.

Also installed were JWF Vice Presidents Danita Dubinsky Aziza, Janice Langer, Susan Michaels and Ellen Kachuck Rosenbluth, along with Women's Campaign Vice Chair Agi Mandel, joined by Portfolio Coordinators Judy Engel, Cheryl Jackson and Carole Sterling.

Axmith, the outgoing Women's Campaign Chair, said she had witnessed, during her term of office, "sacrifices large and small, whether in Kiev or Toronto." Her successor, Vicki Campbell, stressed that "we simply cannot look the other way," when it comes to "tzedaka, social justice and the human values of dignity, freedom, continuity and pride that it provides."

In her closing speech, JWF's Glennie Lindenberg called on women to "follow their hearts and fulfill the needs of Jews here and in Israel."

"Each of us can make a difference," advised incoming President Jill Reitman, "if we are, if we witness and if we accept responsibility."

Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto President Sandra Brown said women bring "sensitivity, collegiality and a sense of team work to their tasks."

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TOGETHER UJA WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

Campbell believes in personal contact

Vicki Campbell, the 1997 UJA Women's Campaign Chair, wants to build on the success of last year's phenomenally successful campaign. "One of my goals," she pledged, "is to continue to personalize the campaign."

As Campaign Chair, Campbell wants to attract new volunteers by making them feel more comfortable in the organization. "We're going to be more flexible in the way we involve our volunteers and help them fit in where they belong," she explained.

Campbell is especially excited about the introduction of mentoring teams designed to teach new canvassers, using a one on one approach. "We really want the women to feel supported and connected."

Campbell has been an active UJA volunteer for 20 years and she believes that "the more I've given the more I've gotten back. I've always made time for UJA," she said, "because it touches so many people."

Among her most memorable Jewish experiences was her bat mitzvah, three years ago, atop Mount Scopus and her participation in the March of the Living, which "showed me continuity in action."

Campbell called her family "the most important team in my life. I want my children," she said, "to have a vibrant Jewish community to grow up in."

The phliosophy under which Vicky Campbell operates is simple but powerful. "We simply cannot look the other way."

Reitman: Togetherness is the message of the hour

Government funding cutbacks. Relief for the poor. Violence against women. These are the major issues with which Jewish Women's Federation will be pre-occupied, and dealing with all of them, according to incoming president Jill Reitman, requires togetherness.

Working together, she said, is "the message of the hour, the foundation for our survival in so many ways and in so many areas of our lives; our future as Jews, our coexistence as Canadians, our ability to preserve our community in the face of social service cutbacks, our solidarity with Israel."

Reitman related a conversation with her 6 year old son, Richard, who asked why G-d made the Jewish people slaves in Egypt. "I said to him 'Richard, G-d didn't make the Jewish people slaves. G-d may have made people but people made other people slaves'... We also talked about the need for witnesses to social injustice to come forward and take action to help those in difficulty. When you see something wrong, do something about it, whether it's for yourself or for others.

Jill Reitman

Reitman's activism was acquired from both her parents and her in-laws. Her mother in-law, Dorothy, was the first woman to become president of Canadian Jewish Congress. Her father was the first Jewish councilman for the town of Mount Royal and her mother rose through the ranks of Hadassah.

"My commitments are strongly rooted in my history, " she said, "and I hope my children will carry on with this legacy."

Reitman, a paediatric psychologist, and her husband, Joel, were what Jill calls "back door neighbours," going to the same schools and sharing the same friends. "At Sukkot, Joel's family would build the sukkah and the neighbourhood "families would share in the festivities. So, b'yachad, togetherness has been a theme in our families and between our families, forever."

This year, under Reitman's leadership, JWF will be establishing a new committee to deal with violence against women, instituting a Community Response Project on the issue of Jewish poverty and continuing to work with Women's Campaign on Timeless Treasures, a successful learning series for women and about women, concentrating primarily on biblical and prophetic texts.

Lindenberg praises JWF women

Reaching out. For outgoing JWF President Glennie Lindenberg, that's what the organization is all about.

In her closing speech, Lindenberg paid tribute to JWF members for addressing key contemporary issues and reaching out to others to do so as well, especially after the series of Israel bombings.

"In the wake of horrific events in Israel, we have all felt the need to reach out," she said. "We have been able to emphasize the leading role women should play.... We must follow our hearts and fulfill the needs of Jews here and in Israel."

Lindenberg also referred to the "inextricable link" between the strength of JWF and the fundraising efforts of UJA's Women's Campaign, which collected close to $4 million last year.

Glennie Lindenberg

Marlene Axmith

Axmith: stepping down from a rewarding year

When Marlene Axmith began her term as Chair of the 1996 UJA's Women's Campaign, she wanted to "branch out into the community and make a difference." As she looks back, Axmith takes pride in the achievements and partnerships that made the Campaign "extremely rewarding."

"The Three Year Vision," explained Axmith, "really gave us an opportunity to go out and educate canvassers and donors about the needs of the community and Israel. The more we talked about the it the more the canvassers bought into it." Thirty percent of Women's Campaign contributors pledged for three years. The 1996 Campaign raised nearly $4 million.

Axmith is especially proud of the work Women's Campaign did with Jewish Women's Federation. But the highlight of her year was the UJA Federation Kiev-Israel Mission last May. "I have been witness to sacrifices, large and small," she said, "whether in Kiev or Toronto."

JEWISH WOMEN'S FEDERATION TOGETHER UJA WOMEN'S CAMPAIGN

Judaism strengthened by female participation

Dr. Rela Mintz Geffen, one of North America's foremost experts on Jewish communities will be in Toronto, April 30 to speak at a program sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Women's Campaign .

In an interview with Community Matters contributing editor Adi Waksman, Dr. Mintz Geffen, who has written more than 30 articles, explains how greater participation by women in Judaism has strengthened Jewish communities around the world.

Q What are some examples of increased participation by Jewish women in Jewish life?

A There are many and they are evident across the board...that is across the religious spectrum. The most obvious trend appears in life cycle rituals having to do with births, bar and bat mitzvas, weddings and deaths.

Mothers are more involved in the bris ceremony, bat mitzvas are being celebrated more formally, brides are participating in more significant ways during the aufrif (when the groom is called to the Torah before the wedding) and more women are reciting kaddish after the death of a parent. Women are finding news ways of partcipating and embellishing old ways.

Q What are some of the other areas in which women are becoming more active?

A In 1980, the first woman graduated with a Ph.d in Talmudic studies from the Jewish Theological Seminary. There's a general increase in women studying the classical texts and we're seeing a real push in Hebrew day schools for young girls to learn rabbinic literature. Rabbinics is the key to power in the Jewish community and we cannot overestimate the impact a super-literate generation of Jewish women can have on the community as a whole.

Women are also playing more important roles in synagogue life, especially in the areas of planning and decision making.

Q What impact is this having on Jewish communities?

A The inclusion of women has created new sensitivities and enhanced Jewish ceremonial life. During a brit mila today there is more flexibility in terms of roles mothers can play.

Q What are some of the challenges that remain for Jewish women?

A There is still a lot of work to be done in modifying some of the liturgy; for example, the portrayal of Jewish women in textbooks. This really is the cutting edge today. This will allow women to feel more comfortable and help them relate better to what they are learning. Another important area is teaching single parents, especially mothers, how to feel comfortable leading prayers, conducting seders, etc. If they don't feel confident, they won't be able to become Jewish role models for their children.

Dr. Mintz Geffen, a professor at Philadelphia's Gratz College, will be speaking on April 30, 7:30 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street. Her topic is In Search of Our Spiritual Growth: What's Changing for Jewish Women. For more information, contact Julie Davis, (416) 631-5698.

You're welcome, says Shalom Toronto

A friendly face and a helping hand can go a long way toward making a new community feel like home. That's why Shalom Toronto, a project of Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Women's Campaign, has been extending warm welcomes to thousands of new arrivals from all over the world.

Over the past year, Shalom Toronto greeters have welcomed more than 100 individuals and families.

SHALOM TORONTO שלום ✡ Making your new community your home ✡

Shalom Toronto relies heavily on word of mouth to identify newcomers, but as program co-chair Sylvia Peck points out "there are many people we don't know about. It's important that we're notified of new arrivals as soon as possbile so we can provide assistance to them right away, when they need it the most."

Shalom Toronto greeters are knowledgable about the community and the services available to newcomers to make their transition easier. They visit the homes of newly arrived Torontonians and bring along a basket full of information and tasty treats.

Eleanor Appleby, also a Shalom Toronto co-chair, stresses how important it is to make newcomers feel welcome." Most people don't realize the difficulty of moving to a new community without knowing anyone. It's nice to know someone cares."

If you're new to Toronto or know someone who is, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 135.

For JWF, poverty is a priority

The Jewish Women's Federation is confronting the problem of poverty in our community.

The Community Response Project was created following a December JWF program about the impact of government cutbacks on women. Recent statistics show that women constitute 60% of the Jewish poor.

Project co-chair Ellen Kachuck Rosenbluth says Community Response is designed "to enhance the services already being provided and develop new programs to meet the needs of poor women and children." Project organizers are currently consulting with various agencies and organizations to assess how volunteers can provide assistance.

"We are still in the midst of finding out where all the shortfalls are," explains Kachuck Rosenbluth. "We're also still working hard to let people know there is a big problem in the community that needs to be addressed."

Project volunteers will be working together with agencies that provide counselling, clothing, food and other necessities. "There are many women," Kachuck Rosenbluth points out, "who are coping with a lot as a result of cutbacks in social spending. We want to alleviate some of their burden."

Jewish public school program killed

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Four months ago, the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (WBJE) formally adopted a Middle Years concept for the new campus scheduled to open in south Winnipeg September 1997.

The directive was that all grades 5 to 8 students in the system would be consolidated on the campus. For parents of students in the north Winnipeg Talmud Torah-I. L. Peretz School (TTILP), it was another blow to their efforts to maintain a BJE school in north Winnipeg.

Despite the pleas of Talmud Torah Parent-Teacher Association (PTA) representatives and the presence of 50 parents and supporters at a recent meeting, the BJE turned back a motion to retain a JK-6 program in the north end.

Despite repeated assurances by outgoing superintendent Dr. Arnold Carmel, BJE presidents past and present and other Winnipeg Jewish community leaders, of their commitment to a BJE presence in north Winnipeg, TTILP parents remain sceptical. Supporters feel a JK-4 school wil not fly.

Speaking on behalf of the parents, TTILP PTA co-chair Harold Sosnowicz alluded to hidden agendas. He traced a BJE history of obfuscation concerning the teaching of Yiddish at Talmud Torah (it was discontinued two years ago); the future of the building, which includes Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (slated for Campus) and the Beth Jacob Synagogue (parents were encouraged to find alternate uses for it before learning the plan was to sell it); and assurances that a JK-6 school would be maintained "as long as numbers warrant it."

Sosnowicz and co-chair Moshe Selchen also referred to a letter they had prepared for distribution through the school to TTILP parents, which Carmel and BJE president Eric Winograd pulled without informing them. The letter, which advised parents of the meeting, was given out outside the school.

Selchen noted that the BJE mission statement encourages parents to actively participate in the schools and community.

"We weren't asking them to riot or bring placards or pull their kids out of school," he said. "We were encouraging them to attend an open board meeting. If this is confrontational, I wonder what else the board considers confrontational. I wonder how the minister of education would react to this when the government is encouraging more parental involvement in schools." (The government provides a large percentage of funding to the BJE and other private school systems.)

Although Winograd agreed the letter was not confrontational, his explanation for blocking its distribution was that he hadn't yet "come to grips with how he was going to handle the meeting."

Selchen also referred to assurances made over the years, which had not been followed through.

"We don't doubt for a minute that the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council would like our school (which numbers about 130 students) to disappear," Selchen said. "It would solve all their worries about not having enough money for Campus."

Selchen cited a scathing letter in the Jewish Post and News a couple of weeks ago from Rocky Pollack, a former BJE co-chair, which said that north Winnipeg parents didn't need an north-end elementary school. He suggested they could just get in their minivans and drive the additional 20 minutes to Campus. Selchen described it as a "frightening letter" and wondered if it reflected the thinking of many of the BJE board members.

"We are not against Campus," he said. "We are prepared to send our older children. We just think we have a wonderful elementary school and we want to keep it. Give us a chance. Let the parents make the choice about whether or not to send their children to Talmud Torah or Campus."

In rebutting the PTA co-chairs' arguments, Carmel defended the Middle Years concept, while Winograd and other opponents of the JK-6 proposal talked about the money to be saved by having all students in grades 5 and 6 at one location.

The $26-million campus in south Winnipeg is intended to house a K-12 school, a Jewish community centre, offices for community organizations, a Jewish museum and the Jewish library.

WHERE IS EVERYONE?

WHERE ARE YOU, who broke the glass under the chupa? What did you think it stood for? Do you still believe that Yerushalayim is safely in our hands?

WHERE ARE YOU, survivors of the Holocaust? Didn't we learn a lesson in Europe? Do you believe we can depend on other nations to save Israel for us? Has the world really changed that much?

WHERE ARE YOU, who still remember the liberation of our holy places in the Six Day War - the Kotel, Kever Rachel, Ma'arat Hamachpela? Don't you realize that we are on the verge of losing them again?

WHERE ARE YOU, who cringed when the arch-terrorist received the Nobel Prize for peace? You who have seen Arab mobs dancing in the streets of Gaza, Jenin, Nablus, Ramallah, whenever Jews were slain? Do you believe that the safety of our people should be left in Arafat's hands?

WHY ARE YOU silent, while the descendants of Amalek are slaughtering Jews with impunity and all that the world's leaders offer us is a circus in the Sinai?

WHY DO YOU shrug your shoulders in resignation, when Eretz Yisrael is being handed over to her enemies?

WHY ARE YOU silent, when you should be protesting, screaming, putting up posters, faxing, calling your community leaders, your Rabbis, the Ambassador, the Prime Minister?

DO YOU BELIEVE that attending memorial meetings and listening to eulogies is all that you can do? Or are you ready to do your part, together with those who are already doing theirs?

Crown hamstrung in war crimes cases

OTTAWA — Justice Minister Allan Rock shrugs and admits dejectedly that it will be "virtually impossible" to convict any more Nazi war criminals in Canada until the criminal code is changed.

And right now, he has no idea when that could be.

There are so many other legal reforms he is planning to bring to Parliament. "I'm not making any predictions," said Rock. "All I can say is that it will be in the fullness of time."

The Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, the Canadian Bar Association, numerous multicultural groups and humanitarian agencies, and a number of international and legal organizations and associations have urged Rock repeatedly to act quickly.

Two years ago a Supreme Court ruling rendered war crimes legislation ineffective. It ruled that Imre Finta, accused of murdering 8,000 Hungarian Jews, was innocent if he had really believed the racial hatred that motivated the killings.

That decision not only shocked Canada's Jewish community and astounded the legal community, but it also meant that no one, not just Nazi war criminals, could be tried in Canada as a war criminal with a reasonable prospect of being convicted.

Allan Rock

That opened the door to war criminals from Rwanda, Ethiopia, Somalia and lately, the "ethnic cleansers" from Bosnia, as well as any other war criminal on the run.

He is aware of the problem, Rock says. "We're drafting changes right now."

There was a meeting in his office only last month, he says, where the topic came up once again, among other reforms being considered.

That's not good enough, says David Matas, a human rights lawyer in Winnipeg who has worked long and hard on war crimes cases. Matas says the problem is getting worse, not better, because the government hasn't acted.

"Right now if you rob a bank and come to Canada, they'll charge you, but if you kill 10,000 people, they can't touch you," says Matas.

"It's complex drafting job," explains Rock. "We have to read the judgment of the Supreme Court judges and make sure we have respected the charter principles they articulated, and we have to draft changes to the code that will enable us to have effective war crimes prosecution that will allow us to make people answerable to these charges, while at the same time avoiding the pitfalls the court identified.

"We're not just talking about World War II here. We're talking about war crimes in general. Sadly, crimes against humanity are not a thing of the past.

"It is a challenging job to create language that respects the charter principles but enables prosecutors as a practicable matter to do their jobs," says Rock.

Since the Finta setback, Canadian prosecutors have resorted to using immigration tribunals and the courts to toss suspected war criminals out of the country, usually back to their country of origin. (Some countries, it appears have managed to get their act together on war crimes prosecutions.)

The hearings are held before immigration adjudicators instead of a jury, and they don't use the same rules of evidence as in a regular court case.

In order to deport a suspected Nazi war criminal, the government has only to prove that he lied about his past on his immigration application to get into Canada. That's usually easier than proving someone was a war criminal and killed people.

Rock says he's not happy with having to use extradition and denaturalization as an alternative.

"Ten years ago, the decision was to have a made-in-Canada approach so we wouldn't be extraditing abroad but judging them here in Canada under our own standards of criminal justice.

"There was a principle that Canada should take responsibility for that which is found in this country and we should have a mature justice system capable of resolving such issues.

"Admittedly there were difficulties of proof, as there always are, and there is the problem of securing evidence and bringing it before a Canadian court, and of the exacting standards we have in establishing guilt, particularly in crimes of such seriousness.

"We are looking at amendments that will change the code and restore some reasonable prospect of success when we have a strong case. We hope to bring these forward in the fullness of time."

Feds shift to citizenship cases

In the meantime, the federal government is going ahead with plans to strip five suspected Nazi war criminals of their Canadian citizenship and deport them back to their countries of origin.

Erichs Tobiass, 84, of North York, Ont.; Helmut Oberlander, 71, of Waterloo, Ont.; Joseph Nemsila, 82, of Oshawa, Ont.; Anatanas Kenstavicius, 90, of Hope, B.C.; and Johann Dueck, 86, of St. Catharines, Ont., are all expected to appear before immigration hearings this spring.

The government has spent about $15 million going after Nazi war criminals. It is only now, after 11 years and all that money, starting to get any results.

Women honored posthumously for Auschwitz revolt

By PAUL McKEAGUE
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — More than a half a century after she was executed for smuggling gunpowder to rebels at Auschwitz, Esther Wajcblum was honored by the Polish government for heroism in the face of Nazi oppression.

The Polish ambassador to Canada, Tadeusz Diem, recently presented the Cross of Auschwitz to Anna Heilman, in posthumous recognition of the courage of her sister.

"Esther Wajcblum was one of the freedom fighters who we always in Poland try to commemorate and honor," Diem said after the ceremony at the Polish Embassy in Ottawa. "After 50 years, Poland is indicating that we have not forgotten."

Wajcblum was one of four young women — the others were Rosa Robota, Regina Sapirstein and Alla Gartner — who were publicly hanged for their roles in a failed revolt at the death camp. They died on Jan. 5, 1945, less than two weeks before the camp was evacuated by the Nazis.

Heilman, a retired Ottawa social worker who was a prisoner at Auschwitz with her older sister, said the honor recognizes that "those girls could not abandon their humanity in circumstances when sadism, bestiality and murder reigned supreme."

Though the women were beaten and tortured before their executions, "they did not give the names of anyone else who was involved," said Heilman, who had herself participated in the gunpowder smuggling. "They only named people who they knew were already killed."

Esther Wajcblum

Wajcblum died just a few days before her 22nd birthday. "I know what is in store for me," she wrote in a final message to her friend and fellow prisoner Marta Bindiger, "but I go readily to the gallows. I only ask you to take care of my sister Hanka. Please don't leave her, so that I may die easier."

The significance of what the four women did "goes beyond differences of religion, nationality and cultural background," said Heilman. "When I see this medal it gives me hope that there are good people alive."

She was particularly grateful to the researchers at Auschwitz who documented their actions and ensured that history would not forget them.

On Oct. 7, 1994, the 50th anniversary of the doomed revolt was marked by the erection of a plaque at Auschwitz to honor the "four Jewish heroic prisoners."

Wajcblum worked in the gunpowder room at the munitions factory in Auschwitz. Day after day she and other women would risk death by stealing gunpowder, wrapping it in bits of cloth and hiding it in their clothing.

They would carry the gunpowder the 3.5 kilometres to Birkenau, where Robota transferred it to male crematoria workers, known as the Sonderkommando.

In one of the most important acts of resistance at the death camp, the Sonderkommando rose up against the Nazis in October 1944, and succeeded in partially blowing up one crematorium. About 400 Jewish and non-Jewish prisoners died in the rebellion.

Wajcblum's actions contradict the widespread notion that in the Holocaust "Jews went like sheep to the slaughter," said Hana Cammy, chair of the Ottawa Shoah Committee.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Mechzikei Hadas said the awarding of the medal by the Polish government is an important "gesture of understanding" which recognizes that people like Wajcblum were in a sense heroes of Poland, as well as Jewish heroes.

"It's another way of saying what happened in the past should never have happened and we reject outright the ugliness and we reject outright the evil and we exalt and ennoble that which was heroic," he said.

The ceremony was attended by about 30 people, including Heilman's husband Joshua, her daughter Ariela and her 9-year-old granddaughter Danika Esther Faiola.

Religious symbols to join cross, poppy for November 11 school services

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Manitoba's largest school board, Winnipeg School Division No. 1 will continue to focus on the cross and the poppy in Remembrance Day services.

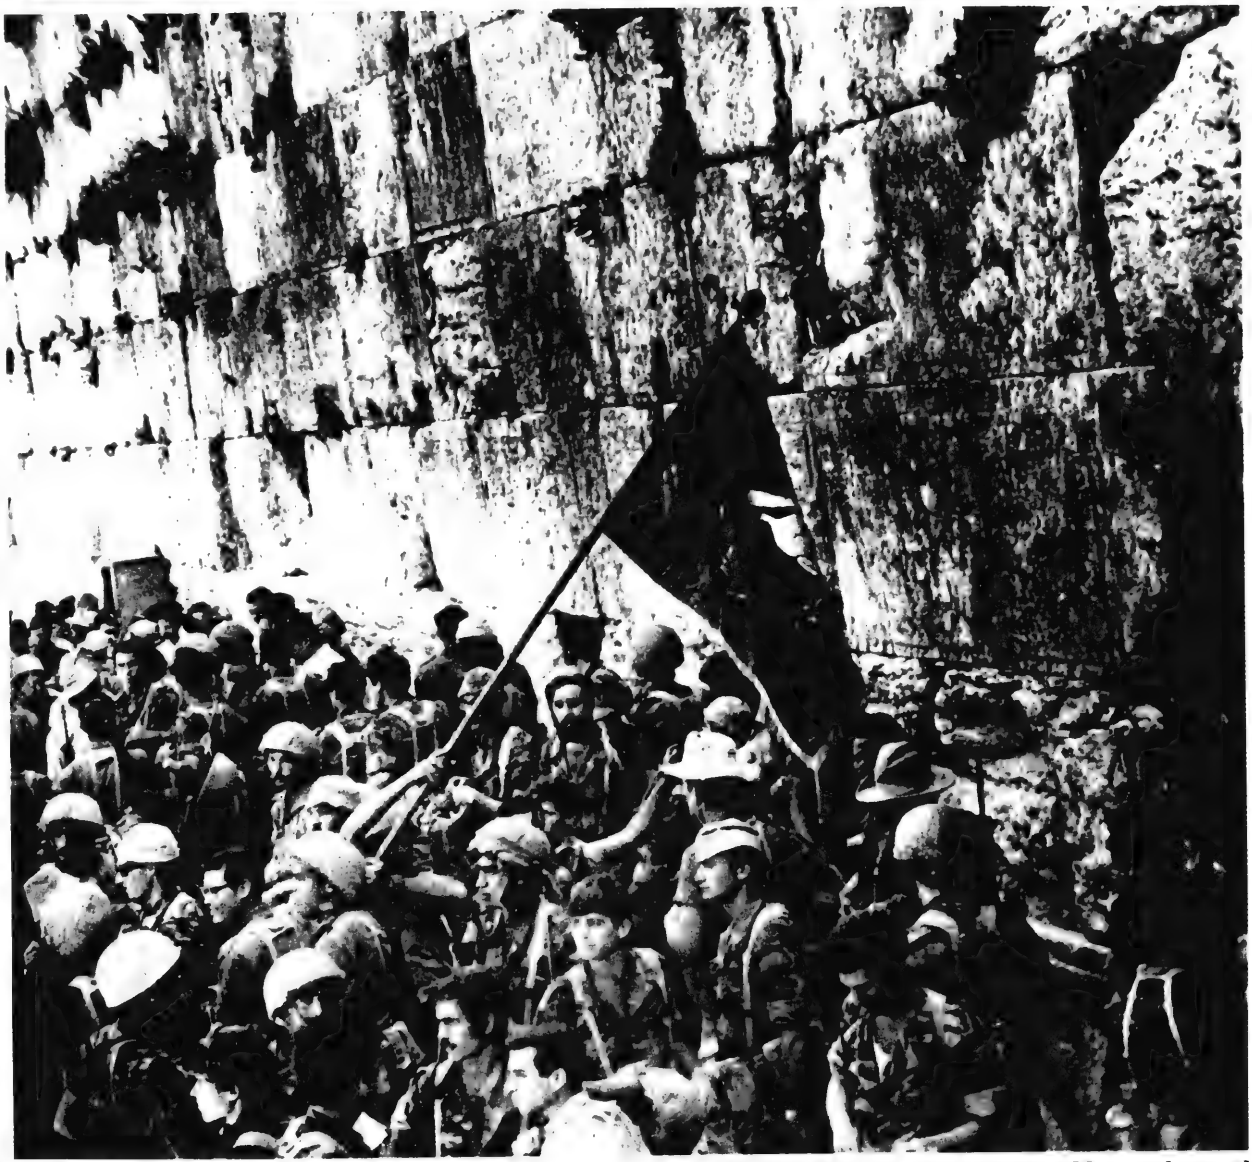
According to board vice-chair Conrad Santos, the cross is viewed in this situation as a symbol of the sacrifices made in wartime, rather than as a religious symbol.

But the good news for non-Christians is that the board will also include other multicultural and religious symbols on Nov. 11 to reflect the multicultural population in the area.

The issue was first raised by in a letter by a Jewish teacher in the public school system who was disturbed by the proliferation of crosses at Remembrance Day services in her school.

As a result of her letter, representatives of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and the Manitoba Islamic Association approached the board about including other religious symbols for Remembrance Day services.

PASSOVER GREETINGS



Since the destruction of the second temple in 70 C.E., the last words of the Passover seder, "l'shana haba'ah b'yerushalayim", "Next year in Jerusalem", have always symbolized the first prayer and the deepest stirring of Jewish history and the Jewish heart. Seen in this photo are the paratroopers who recaptured the Temple Mount and restored the Western Wall to Jewish sovereignty in 1967 and who, in the process, brought new meaning to the words of the ancient prayer.

Pre-Pesach's a roller coaster

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

An out-of-control roller coaster. Yup, that just about describes life in my household in the past few months.

Editorial

On the one hand, one child hospitalized, one child ill at home, the third in emotional turmoil. It may seem a cliche that when a child is ill, the parents need the medicine, but let me assure you it is the absolute truth.

On the other hand, one of those same children became engaged. And that is exciting if anything is.

We find ourselves rocketing back and forth between despair and joy, tears and laughter, terror and contentment.

Much like the rest of the Jewish community just now.

We have not recovered from the shock and horror of the suicide bombings in Israel. We feel for our brothers and sisters there who can no longer take for granted such a mundane experience as the daily bus ride to work.

At the same time, who among us is not getting a certain thrill at the Jerusalem 3000 celebrations, where pageants, concerts, plays, conferences and even cooking festivals send a message to the world — and to ourselves — about our love and devotion to our eternal city?

Pesach mirrors this constant swing between the good and bad in our lives.

It is a never-ending joke that when G-d freed the slaves on Pesach, he didn't free us from the sheer havoc of the shopping, cleaning, searching, packing, unpacking, planning and cooking that preparing for the holiday entails.

We won't even mention the challenge of making sure that Auntie Perele doesn't get seated next to Auntie Miriam at the seder, as they haven't spoken to each other since one of them wouldn't give the other her secret recipe for knaidlach.

And yet — is there a greater sense of inner peace than looking around the beautifully arranged seder table at the family and friends gathered around you and realizing that all the effort, in the end, is worth it?

We often get so caught up in the stories of the plagues and Aaron's staff eating up the Egyptian sorcerers' snakes and, especially, the panorama of the thousands of Jewish men, women and children gathering their belongings and starting on what will turn out to be a 40-year journey, that we forget the tragedies behind the exodus.

We forget the babies destroyed by a fearful Pharaoh, the shame of a once-proud people reduced to slavery, the hopelessness that led men to refuse to have relations with their wives so as to avoid bringing more slaves into the population.

A few years ago, a popular song noted: "I never promised you a rose garden."

A student guest for the Sabbath

I had been in Jerusalem for just five days. It was Wednesday and I was sitting on an Egged bus going to my new home: shikkun hastudentim, Rehov Shmuel Hanavi. A lady sitting next to me tried to engage me in a conversation in Hebrew, which was hard since I knew only a couple of words:

By Sarah Taieb-Carlen

"At olah chadashah?" (Are you a new immigrant?)

"Ken." (Yes)

"Studentit?" (Student?)

"Ken." (Yes)

When we discovered that we both spoke Arabic, she asked:

Are you going to spend your first Shabbat with your family in Jerusalem?

I have no family in Israel. I am going to spend it with the students in the shikkun.

No, you are coming to us. It's lonely when we have no guests on Friday night.

Shortly before Shabbat, I walked to my new friend's house and knocked on the door. One of the daughters invited me in and called her mother. Ruth introduced me to her husband, an exhausted-looking baker; to both her and his parents who lived with them; and to their eight children, the youngest two of whom were twins in wheelchairs.

I looked around me and was fascinated. The walls were completely covered from ceiling to floor with hand-embroidered "scenes" of Jerusalem: a miniature Temple, the Kotel, Migdal David, Absalom's pillar, the gates of the old city, the Jerusalem hills, the King David Hotel, the Knesset, the museum, the Shrine of the Book and many others. One "picture" consisted of just a few Hebrew words which I was then unable to read: Im eshkachek Yerushalayim, tishkach yemini (If I forget thee, Jerusalem, may my right hand forget me).

Before and after the meal, they all sang songs about Jerusalem, songs from Iraq, Kurdistan and Israel. Jerusalem of Gold was their favorite — they sang it three times during the evening. The grandparents told me legends, anecdotes and stories about Jerusalem, about the mystic and healing power of its shechinah (divine presence). They kept repeating "Zechut lehivaled b'Yerushalayim" (It is a privilege to be born in Jerusalem).

The children, who all spoke English, explained that it had been a very old tradition in their father's and mother's families to make Jerusalem wall-hangings, which were favorite wedding, bar mitzvah and birthday gifts.

The three daughters took me to their room and opened a trunk full of Jerusalem "pictures;" some were very old, others they had made themselves in their free time. They loved Jerusalem, but said that they dreamed of spending a few years at the University of Tel Aviv or the Technion in Haifa and their parents seemed to understand.

This evening has stayed etched in my mind for several reasons. The first was the pervasive feeling of joy and happiness in this family despite the "hardship" of the twin boys in their wheelchairs and the ill, confused grandmother who kept asking questions such as: What time is it? When is breakfast? No one was rude to her and there was always someone to give her an answer.

There was also the fervor with which they sang the zemirot, Eshet Chayil and the Jerusalem songs, and the way they recited the Kiddush.

The food — I remember mostly kubbeh, sambousek and little almond and date pastries — was a delicious first for me.

But I believe it was the homemade museum which impressed me most. I had spent my first five days in Jerusalem walking all over the city to discover it on my own, to create my own attachment to it, to feel and understand it. By a strange coincidence, I was spending my first Shabbat in a room which looked like a miniature Jerusalem, with people who lived in Jerusalem and in whom Jerusalem lived.

Paris pales in comparison to Jerusalem's incredible beauty

By Maxyne Finkelstein

I visited Jerusalem and explored the land of Israel twice as a teenager. Once from my bedroom while reading Leon Uris' Exodus and again for a brief few weeks with a friend in 1975. In some ways, the voyage to Israel with the characters from Exodus was vastly more romantic than my journey via El Al.

As I travelled with the heroes of Exodus, I fought vigorously for the safe and secure arrival of Kitty Fremont and the other passengers, and of course I fell in love with Ari Ben Canaan of the Mossad Aliyah Bet.

On my own trip, I fell in love with many of Ben Cannan's descendants, who, some 30 years later, were still protecting the safety and security of the Jewish people. And I learned to love almost everything in Jerusalem, even the people whom I at first found so different and difficult. In fact, it took a few more visits to Israel before I learned to appreciate the people as much as the land and I have since learned the complex intertwining of the two that allows for no real separation.

I spent most of my time exploring Jerusalem in a way that enabled me to know the city while exploring my own Judaism and its meaning. I spent many hours speaking to people who told me their stories, so that I could understand their struggle and my place in that struggle. I met Israelis who were quick to communicate their profound contempt for "American" Jews and a few who were anxious to come home with me.

Through getting to know Jerusalem, I grew to understand commitment, values and history. During my first days in Jerusalem, I stayed at a hotel near the Jaffa Gate. Each morning I walked through the gate and bought coffee from an Arab vendor who would freely offer us advice on what to visit that day in Jerusalem.

I wandered the narrow streets with the confidence of 17-year-old Canadian, ready to go anywhere and speak to anyone who was interested in conversation. Of course I bought a much-valued sheepskin jacket and wore it for the next few winters as the proud sign of one who had visited Jerusalem.

I had not arrived in Israel expecting any significant impact. I had come from Paris, overwhelmed by the history and romance of that city. And in spite of a strong commitment to the symbolism of Israel, I was completely unprepared for what awaited me. My decision to visit Jerusalem had been motivated largely by my friends' stories of the friendly people and great beaches in the south, rather than any spiritual longing that I was aware of.

Paris paled more with each day spent in Jerusalem. I wanted to understand everything about the city and most of all, how history had converged in such an extraordinary way here. I was most amazed that there was a place in the world that could encompass a person with such energy and that each visitor could define Jerusalem as whatever it represented to him or her, rather than just welcoming them as passive observers.

My love of Jerusalem was reinforced by travelling the land. The splendor of the Judean Hills, the rough magnificence of the Negev and the chaos of Tel Aviv all reinforced the importance of Jerusalem and its unique role in shaping the past and future of Israel. Most important, though, was coming to know the intense faith that pervaded this city in a way I could never have imagined. After leaving Jerusalem that first time, I believed that I had left a bit of my soul in that sacred city. I have since come to understand that Jerusalem and all it represents somehow "velcroed" to my soul and I left Israel with this eternal gift that would only be enriched on each subsequent visit.

Pesach's a new start

didn't include unending happiness; nor did it preclude suffering.

What happened at Pesach was a new beginning for the Jewish people, not just a liberation from slavery, but a chance to start again as a nation.

Maybe what we have to realize, as we swing between the zenith and the nadir, is that true happiness comes from the trust we have that ultimately, G-d will free us from our troubles and that we will be able to move from the darkness of despair to the sunshine of freedom and joy.

From all of us at The CJN, may Pesach be the start of good times, peaceful times, hopeful times, for all Jews, everywhere.

Passover Greetings

Jerusalem truly is a part of us all

It is said that G-d gave 10 gifts of beauty to the world. Nine went to Jerusalem and one was left for the rest of the world. Those who have set their eyes, minds and hearts on Jerusalem, the city of gold, know it is true. So much of who we are as Jews is tied to this place.

I remember the first time my mother saw the walls of the old city. The expression on her face made me understand how parents feel when their children see or do something for the first time. It is a sense of awe and comprehension with new and ever expanding bounds.

This year, as part of Mission 3000, I entered Jerusalem with an excited busload of people. Some had been there before; others had not. On our way to our evening program, we stopped to see the city from atop Mt. Scopus, to say a thankful Shehechianu for arriving at this magical and much fought over spot on earth. I asked our group to repeat the last line of the Passover Hagaddah, which they had recited for decades — L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalyim — next year in Jerusalem. For those of us standing on Mt. Scopus, we had made it. This year we were in Jerusalem.

With tears filling our eyes, we admired the lights of the city; each with our own thoughts; all agreeing Jerusalem is the most beautiful place on G-d's earth.

The reaction to this holy city has been the same for generations: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth and may my right hand lose its cunning."

Our ancestors have celebrated, struggled and sometimes died to preserve our Jerusalem for every one of us. Those who came before us travelled great distances under much duress to participate in Jerusalem's temple ceremonies. We, too, travelled far and wide to experience the wonder and joy that is Jerusalem.

I believe there are four genetic parts to a Jew. One is the cholesterol genes we all carry. Another is the guilt gene that makes us think. In the centre, in our hearts, is the pinteleh Yid (the little piece of Jew) we all have that needs just a small spark to light a huge flame within us. And last, but certainly not least, there is Israel, with Jerusalem as its soul, speaking out to us and helping us form a full and rounded Jewish identity.

As the Pesach season once again comes upon us, we are drawn to the lives of those who preceded us and enabled us to reach this season. We will read once again about the obstacles they overcame and the commitment they showed as a people. There is sadness and joy as there are in most things in life. But there is one thing to remember above all, our forefathers did arrive in the land of Israel and they paved the way for King David later in history to make Jerusalem our eternal capital.

And once again this year at our Pesach tables we will say L'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalyim.

The more things change...

By Shira Herzog

This world of [historic] dialogues, which we follow day in, day out, as the pendulum swings back and forth, came home to me very vividly on 8 June, 1967, the day we took Jerusalem, reunited for all time. I went to the old city. I heard the muezzins proclaiming prayer from the minarets. I closed my eyes for a moment and hoped that it was no longer the call for jihad, holy war. Surely the time had come for the call for peace.

"I saw our soldiers as they handled their machine guns in the deserted city, as their eyes met the Arabs behind the lattices of their homes, as they began to weave a new dialogue. No longer, as depicted in Arab propaganda, was this Israel the monster, no longer Israel the conqueror. This was Israel coming home. And, as I moved up towards the Mount of Olives, I saw a great stir as the soldiers moved toward the Western Wall. I inquired what was happening, and they said: A great kabbalist in Jerusalem has asked to see the Western Wall. He fears he may pass on before he sees it with his living eyes. And so they took him by jeep, for the roads were torn up, so they brought him to the Wall.

"I recalled how, 20 years earlier, in 1948, on that Sabbath when the labor of exile came to an end and Jewish independence was proclaimed, I saw the kabbalists in Jerusalem, in the city under siege, as they eyed the young soldiers, and the one said to the other: 'These methods of the 20th century will not bring us redemption.' The other seemed to answer with his eyes: 'But how long can we wait? We have waited long enough.' Their eyes met at first in suspicion, but later in harmony. And the kabbalists were with the soldiers as they reached the Wall." (As told by Yaacov Herzog, 1971.)

"...the Kabbalists were with the soldiers as they reached the Wall."

My father, Yaacov Herzog, then prime minister Levi Eshkol's most trusted advisor, spent the early days of the 1967 Six Day War in the IDF war room, with the nation's military and political leaders. From there, he phoned us at 8:30 a.m. on June 6, minutes after the Egyptian and Syrian air forces had been decimated, to say, "We have won the war."

At that time, Jordan had not yet attacked Israel, but residents of Jerusalem were already staying close to home. For weeks, we had prepared our homes for a prolonged state of uncertainty. Sandbags were everywhere, and we had stocked up on non-perishables and water. For many native Jerusalemites, this was reminiscent of the 1948 siege. They weren't taking any chances.

And then, at approximately 10 a.m., the first Jordanian shells were lobbed across the dividing line that had split the city for 19 years. Two days later, on June 8, Israeli soldiers were approaching the Western Wall in a reunited city. My father told the story of his first visit to the Wall with the prime minister of Israel many times. For him, that moment captured the essence of the Jewish return to Zion — the metaphysical and the real, the material and the spiritual, the sense of being and belonging and the sense of going through an exercise of historical destiny.

A few days later, with special military permits in hand, I visited the Wall with my parents. But I also saw a breathtaking view of Jerusalem from the one spot that has remained my favorite ever since. At the old UN headquarters, now at the edge of the Haas Promenade, Jerusalem the golden rises from the desert and touches the sky. There one sees the beginnings of the ancient city of David and the growth of the city as it spilled over into history and space. There, for me, the temporal and the spiritual meet. There for me, ever since, is a place for contemplation and for a prayer for the peace of Jerusalem.

All senses and emotions are heightened

When I close my eyes and consider Jerusalem, the memories include aromas and sounds. Thoughts of

By Arna Poupko

Jerusalem are located not in my mind, but in that place in the soul where we feel pain upon seeing a child's scraped knee and the place which responds to the moment of greatness in a familiar piece of music.

Without the use of the language of our prayers and the noble imagery of our writings, one can hardly speak of Jerusalem. Descriptions of Jerusalem do not lend themselves to normative uses of language associated with usual vacation spots, for spending time in Jerusalem is not really a vacation, and Jerusalem is certainly not a spot of anything. Jerusalem, after all, has been used by our tradition as the paradigm of beauty on earth and that which most closely resembles heaven on earth.

Upon graduating high school, I was amongst the fortunate who were given the gift of a year and a few months in Israel. It was a year of Torah study and personal discovery. It is still impossible for me to know which aspect of that year had the greater impact — the texts of our people or the city of our people. I clearly recall the competition between the two, each informing and complicating my relationship with the other.

Living in Jerusalem is like undergoing some kind of strange science experiment where all senses and emotions are heightened, creating an openness and vulnerability to the poetic and the sublime, and a reticence, or even disdain, for the stuff of every day.

The Wall Street Journal several years ago published an article entitled The Jerusalem Syndrome. It described a strange form of psychosis which strikes an unsuspecting Jerusalem tourist, causing them to ride the back of Egged Buses and shout claims of messianism and imminent redemption.

While none of my roommates exhibited signs of suffering from "Jerusalem Syndrome" by suddenly replacing jean skirts with long white robes, we certainly developed a heightened sensitivity to the spirituality around us.

Even the most grounded and practical of my fellow students found themselves reconsidering career and personal paths so carefully planned during the final months of high school. Old models and assumptions about ourselves were quickly replaced with those far more reflective of our new idealism and commitment. This process is the evolution that many young students away from home experience, but, in this case, with a vengeance! It was at once liberating and intensely disorienting.

Many educators have attempted to identify the essence of Jerusalem. Of late, those involved in promoting and organizing trips to Israel for Jewish youth have tried to define and isolate its power, with the hope of harnessing the experience to its utmost. Others committed to the promotion of Jewish identity on Diaspora soil, are eagerly creating local educational models which they hope will reproduce some of Jerusalem's energy and influence.

While all of these efforts are certainly worthy, and may lead to greater understanding of the components of any potentially transformative experience, I prefer to opt for a less deconstructive approach to the holiest of cities. If Jerusalem is indeed a piece of heaven on earth, then within its unique boundaries one may find flashes of the soul.

I have often heard visitors remark that they feel at their very best when visiting Jerusalem, which, as students, we certainly did. This makes perfect sense, for it is the one place where the outside mirrors the inside. To behold the glory of Jerusalem is to glimpse the beauty of a soul which is informed by the spirit of G-d. This is the source of our bewilderment when we consider its grandeur, for, after all, we are only human.

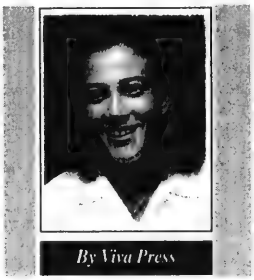
Mahane Yehuda - a market pulsating with life



By Viva Press

Jerusalem usually evokes images of the Kotel, the old city, the Mount of Olives. But for me there is another place that always invokes Jerusalem — Mahane Yehuda. Situated on Jaffa Road a few blocks from the central bus station, Mahane Yehuda is primarily a fruit and vegetable market, a market where Jerusalemites do their shopping, a market pulsing with life.

When I worked in Jerusalem last summer, I chose to buy my weekly groceries at Mahane Yehuda rather than in the sparkling air-conditioned Super-Sol grocery store in the neighborhood where I lived. I was always entertained by the clusters of merchants rubbing shoulders with one another as they shout out their goods and prices, and the feisty women who bicker furiously about who gets what first.

After living in Israel for more than two months, I persuaded myself that I was almost a true sabra. I dressed like a typical Israeli in jeans and a T-shirt. I mastered the bus etiquette; in other words, not to get in anyone's way. And if I spoke quickly, my Canadian Hebrew sounded passable, almost like the genuine thing.

I started off by going to the market on the less crowded weekdays.

But the day arrived when I told myself I was ready to go to Mahane Yehuda on erev Shabbat.

I arrived one Friday with my single-person's shopping list memorized. There were hundreds of Jerusalemites pushing and nudging their way through the damp alleys looking for the best prices. After I had carefully selected the three big oranges that I wanted, I waved my bag in front of the vendor. There were already a dozen or more bulging bags and a throng of hands waving in front of him. When he got to my bag, he looked askance at me for a moment and then started to laugh. He yelled to his friend in a guttural Hebrew I had not yet heard and they both snickered. Who was buying just three oranges on erev Shabbat? The other shoppers got a kick out of it, too. I paid for my oranges, but before I had the chance to say thank you I was jolted forward by the ever growing mob behind me.

I followed the crowd until I got to the hummus tout. His booth has a little table that I was able to grab, in order to support myself and let the rush of people continue past me. I asked for a small container of hummus. He was just about to overcharge me when I reminded him, in Hebrew, that a week ago I had paid two shekels less. He apologized. He said he had mistaken me for a tourist and wished me a Shabbat Shalom.

I had my hummus and my oranges. Now I needed some vegetables. I bought all of my vegetables from Yossi. Yossi stands on a crate balanced above his piles of produce, arms folded, with a cigarette hanging from his lips. Every now and then he'll tap the ashes onto his produce and shout out some garbled words to attract prospective buyers to his stand. I always shopped at Yossi's and on this Friday he greeted me with a smirk. What is this amateur weekday shopper doing here on erev Shabbat?

I took my usual five carrots, two zucchinis, two potatoes, three cobs of corn and whatever else Yossi put into my bag. He never charged me more than a couple of shekels. For everything. I took the bag from him and turned to say thanks. But Yossi was already trying to convince a haredi man that his produce was better than the vendor's alongside him.

With my grocery shopping done, I allowed myself to be swept along by the crowd as I soaked up the sights and smells of Mahane Yehuda. I passed the fresh smell of strawberries, the overpowering smell of fish, the sweet smell of pastries.

The religious women with their long sleeves and sheitls filled their bags with rugelach and cookies. I took a plastic bag and grabbed two chocolate rugelach. I knew this would cause a commotion. I only wanted two: one to eat and one for later. The rugelach vendor lifted my bag into the air and announced to all the shoppers what I had done. Only two rugelach. After a good chuckle, he put two more into my bag and told me they were free.

So why is is that I choose to shop at a place where tourists are overcharged, where nothing smells like it should because something else is overpowering it, where people push and shove? Because it's echt. Authentic. Because Mahane Yehuda is an indigenous market, full of vivid color and poignant smells. It is not another tourist attraction where Israelis put on a show. This is the real thing.

To me, Jerusalem means the Kotel, the old city, the Mount of Olives and Mahane Yehuda. I look forward to my next shopping expedition there this coming summer.

Jerusalem reaches past our minds to hold our hearts

Shall I begin to discuss the irony of Jerusalem — the City of Peace that does not live up to its name?

By Rachel Turkieniez

Writers throughout time have pondered this tiny golden city and its myriads of meaning. I do not wish to write of the paradox that is Jerusalem; I do not wish to write of the controversy that is Jerusalem, the politics and the battles. These are issues of the mind, and Jerusalem is a place that reaches our minds only after she has passed through our hearts.

All that could be said of Jerusalem has been said through the ages by those far greater than I. We have heard of her beauty, her charm, her religious significance, but we have not learned of her soul. Anyone who has walked the streets of this city cannot deny that Jerusalem embodies a soul all her own.

In ancient times, God designated Jerusalem to be the city where Solomon was to build the Temple. The neighborhood that contains the house where the presence of God dwells would surely be a proud place, a boastful place. And yet Jerusalem sits modestly and quietly while she allows mankind to play political games in her arena.

Jerusalem's soul must have begun as the soul of a child — innocent, close to God, waiting to view the wonders to be found. As each generation walked her streets, the city felt their steps and her essence grew. When King Saul went slowly mad, Jerusalem enveloped his suffering and his pain entered her soul. When King David danced before the ark of God, his joy entered her soul. When Uzziah fortified her walls, his strength made her strong. Throughout time, the city has seen the glories of our people and the despairs of our nation.

Jerusalem has been built and destroyed and rebuilt countless times. Jeremiah the prophet writes of the ruin that was Jerusalem; we hear the wolves howling as they roam through the wreckage and this too has fed her soul. We cannot separate ourselves from this ancient place and yet can we truly say we own it?

Jewish philosophers have written about the connection between Jerusalem and the Jewish people; Jewish poets have composed songs depicting this same tie. A modern Israeli songwriter wrote: "Jerusalem of gold ... for all your songs I am the violin." This one sentence tells of our subservience to this great city. We are not the singers, we are not the composers. It is the city itself that creates the tune and sings it to the world. We are but the instruments that accompany her creativity.

In ancient times, the Israelites experienced the loss of this city and we have sat in exile for 2,000 years. Our literature clearly shows that we have always directed our hearts toward Jerusalem, regardless of whether or not we dwelled in Israel. To believe that we could own this city is to deny the fact that Jerusalem owns us. In her gentle way, she has woven her soul into ours and she has become the master.

A few weeks ago, I attended a festival of song performed by Jewish school students in the Toronto area. I sat through the afternoon listening to young children sing about the city of Jerusalem. The theme of the entire performance was "Jerusalem" and the children serenaded the audience with songs of praise and longing for this ancient city. I wondered if these young people could truly understand the history of their words; could they grasp that the voices of children such as themselves have been directed to this city for thousands of years?

In the audience sat parents, grandparents, aunts and uncles. As the children filed into the room, there were many waves of hello and smiles of pride. All the hours of rehearsing and the inconvenience of practices were finally seeing a successful outcome. One by one the groups stood to sing their songs. The first song rang out and the children began to unfold a portrait of Jerusalem for all the adults in the room.

The hall became strangely silent as we listened to these sweet voices evoke the soul of Jerusalem — and it filled our hearts. Some of the lyrics were biblical and we knew that for centuries we have had this bond. I felt these emotions stirring in me and I glanced at the stranger seated to my left. I heard her swallow back the beginnings of a tear. At that moment I knew that Jerusalem owned everyone in that room.

The children could not have understood the power of their voices; they could not have understood the hidden tear in this woman's eyes. They do not understand the soul of Jerusalem — but I know, beyond any doubt, one day they will.

"I am a stone,
Like all the stones of Jerusalem."

Passover holidays always a journalist's delight

By JANICE ROSEN

April 6, 1936 — We were busy cleaning for Passover ... April 7 — Today we took in all the Passover dishes and took away the chometz ... April 8 — Well, it's Passover already. (Rebecca Dresher, 17 years old, Hoffer, Sask.)

I had hoped to depict a women's perspective on Passover as gleaned from the Canadian Jewish Congress Archives. However, the women's diaries and notes I discovered said very little about the season. Far more references are found in the (usually male-authored) articles in the Jewish press.

The earliest Jewish newspaper in Canada began printing before locally-made Passover products were available. In 1898, the Jewish Times of Montreal carried an advertisement by Fraser, Viger & Co. on St. James Street, listing several Passover products (most of them imported from New York), including kosher tea, matzot, "patent meal," macaroons, smoked breasts of beef, Gouda cheese and "Hat Zucker" brandy. All carried rabbinical certificates, and the store had appointed a shomer, Mr. Mittenthal, to ensure the quality.

In 1901, the newspaper advertised Aunt Babette's Cookbook, a 560-page resource containing "33 special Pesach dishes," including "Chrimel, Matzo Kloesse, Matzo Kugel, Matzo Schalet, Potato Pudding and Ueberschlagene."

One of Yiddish writer Isaac Yampolsky's many early 20th-century Passover stories (originally published in the Keneder Adler, or Eagle), describes the traditional making of matzot, in the form of a dialogue between two Jews in the New World. (The translation is by David Rome.)

"... Here in America the matter of matzot is simple: 'and they ate.' They buy matzot and they eat them as they buy herring, potatoes ... But simply to buy and to eat is nothing. There is no taste to it at all. I do not question you. I only tell you that we have no path. we have lost our way."

Passover food aside, however, this holiday season has always provided Jewish journalists with an opportunity to editorialize about the current physical and moral state of the community they serve.

The Jewish Times of 1899 quotes from the Passover sermon of Rabbi Bernard Kaplan, of Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim Congregation: "Israel is still suffering from intolerance at the hands of the enemies of progress and individual freedom. Only the other day, a Roman priest in this city insulted most cruelly the entire Jewish community by declaring in the pulpit and in the press that the Hebrews walk in darkness."

On the eve of the Great Depression, Passover articles in the Anglo-Jewish press emphasized the loss of traditional values. Reform Rabbi Ferdinand M. Isserman wrote in the Canadian Jewish Review in April 1929:

"From the Union Haggadah, prepared by the Central Conference of American Rabbis, all references to the 10 plagues with which tradition indicates a wrathful deity plagued the overbearing Egyptians have been omitted. We believe the omission to be a wise one. The Haggadah is meant primarily for children. To tell them that certain supernatural occurrence were true, which the adult knows to have been impossible, is bad pedagogy. To link religion with the historicity of miracles is bad religion."

On the same day, the paper's editor opined, albeit with regret: "In the more distinctively Jewish sections one fails to observe the stir and hustle of the preparations for the festival ... And in the Jewish homes, the festival will play a small part. It will be a scarcely perceptible bit of atmosphere."

In more troubled times, Jews seem far more likely to emphasize the precept that one should read the Passover story as if one had come oneself out of Egypt. Nowhere is this more vividly illustrated in the Jewish press than during World War II and its aftermath.

The poetic voice of ghost-writer A. M. Klein is discernible in Canadian Jewish Congress president Samuel Bronfman's Passover message of 1942, printed in the Jewish Standard:

"History repeats itself. As we survey the ebb and flow of the struggle in which the whole world is encompassed, we cannot fail to note how the conflict between the would-be pharaohs and the people whom they would enslave is being re-enacted once again, only this time upon a much larger scale, with far more savage weapons and against a much greater number of victims. Once more the arrogant tyrant in all the occupied countries of Europe is flinging into the waters of destruction the first-born of the conquered peoples, their intellectual and spiritual leaders; and once more is heard the agonized groan of great masses slaving beneath the whip of their taskmaster. Old cities are again being destroyed to satisfy the destructive zeal of the foe; and new cities — the factories of Pithom, the arsenals of Rameses — are being built by the sweat of disarmed peoples to forge the very chains of their slavery."

And where do we fit into the pattern this Passover of 1996? Are we comfortable Canadian Jews lamenting a more colorful past, or (in Quebec, at least) do we see ourselves as beleaguered Hebrews wishing to flee a disintegrating Canada?

Janice Rosen is the archives director at Canadian Jewish Congress in Montreal.

Women credited for revival of Rosh Chodesh celebration

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Rosh Chodesh, a minor Jewish holiday, which for a long time was pretty well ignored except for a prayer once a month, was reclaimed as a festive occasion for women about 20 years ago in an article by Jewish feminist Arlene Agus.

But it is being celebrated more frequently throughout the Jewish world, as women's Rosh Chodesh groups are formed.

Agus, an original member of Ezrat Noshim, the first Jewish feminist organization in the United States, is credited with reviving awareness of the day, according to one of the 18 essays on the subject in a book compiled and edited by Susan Berrin of Victoria and published in February by Jason Aronson Inc. of New Jersey and London.

Berrin, the wife of Rabbi Victor Reinstein of Congregation Emanu-El in Victoria, is a graduate of the universities of California and Boston and became aware of the feminine aspects of Rosh Chodesh when she joined a group in Jerusalem.

The book, Celebrating the New Moon, gives in detail the history — or rather *her*story — of the holiday, which is believed to date back to Creation and certainly can be traced to the Exodus.

Celebrating the New Moon not only details Rosh Chodesh ceremonies and celebrations, it also carries a wide selection of appropriate music with the words, and a number of poems, prayers and meditations. There is scientific information about the moon, a glossary of Hebrew terminology, a bibliography of resources on the holiday and a fascinating section on how various women's organizations observe it.

Blu Greemberg of New York, who writes and lectures on matters of contemporary Jewish interest, calls the book "a Rosh Chodesh siddur and anthology, all in one." She says it records the history and Halachah of the holiday and is a blueprint on ways to observe it.

In the foreword, Berrin says the cycle of the moon mirrors women's body cycles, and "menstruation" means "moon change."

In the course of one menstrual cycle, which corresponds to the 29½-day revolution of the moon, a woman may experience her own personal waxing and waning of energy and desire, Berrin says. Indeed, one Rosh Chodesh group in Maryland has a special ceremony for a young girl who has had her first period.

Berrin says Rosh Chodesh gives women a chance each month to "contemplate and review our behavior and our relationship with others — and to seek atonement in renewal and renewal in atonement."

Susan Berrin

She links Rosh Chodesh specifically with women, using a commandment given the Israelites as they prepared to leave Egypt (Exodus 12:2): "This renewal of the moon shall be for you (the woman) a beginning of new moons. It shall be for you the first among the months of the year. The renewing moon is a sign that God will renew its people ... The moon is a covenant of hope."

The Talmud says Rosh Chodesh was given to righteous women as a reward for refusing to surrender their jewelry for the golden calf. Berrin says the holiday is "a pivotal force" in Jewish feminism.

Greenberg claims the holiday has not been taken away from men. Rather, she says, "we are enlarging and taking the community into its act of sacred celebration."

Women are not required to work on Rosh Chodesh. Agus says the holiday in some ways is similar to Rosh Hashanah, "for as we pray for the blessings of renewal, we are judged for our sins — we are purified." She adds that "it's a mitzvah to eat in abundance on Rosh Chodesh."

The celebrations described are as varied as the women's groups themselves.

In Vancouver, each woman brings a vegetarian snack to share. The celebration begins with a song, a dance and drumming, followed by an invocation over the candles. There is an exploration of a theme, followed by discussion, poem or midrash writing, song and dance. Prayers and refreshments wind up the evening.

In Winnipeg, the group has "rituals for healing" for members and for women at large, for example after receiving a ge or other life transitions. Art, candle lighting and movement are included in the "renewal of creativity rite."

In Montreal, Norma Joseph, president of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights, says, "We daven a traditional service, using a siddur we created ourselves. We have access to a Torah and include a Torah reading."

In Victoria, the women daven Shacharit and then begin with a matrilineal welcome. They include Hallel (Psalms praising God) and a Torah reading. Women are encouraged to try their new davening skills aloud. Refreshments are served.

In Jerusalem, 10 to 12 women meet to discuss different topics each month, such as "growth," for Shvat "light" for Kislev or "grief" for Av. Women can bring some creative writing to share. One woman may teach a song, another leads a discussion. "There is lots of food, soda, juice and hot drinks."

In Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, Jewish women's spirituality is explored through healing meditation. Adult women are prepared for bat mitzvah. There is emphasis on interreligious meetings.

Rabbi Tracy Guren Klein conducts a ceremony on the beach at Carmel, Calif. She focuses on restoring the Shechinah (God's feminine attributes) to contemporary Jewish practice. A biographical sketch about the rabbi says she includes the otters, seals and dolphins in her davening.

Celebrating the New Moon retails at $35 (US). You can order a copy by calling 1-800-782-0015. Although this is a U.S. 800 number, Canadian calls are accepted.

Copp Clarke in Mississauga is the Canadian distributor and the book can be bought at Israel's or Negev Importing in Toronto.

The book was launched Feb. 29 at a reception at Congregation Emanu-El.

Adoption in the Jewish community...

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Special Report

Each month for 10 years, Debra Nefsky tried to get pregnant. Each month, she and her husband, Lee, failed.

In addition to trying naturally, the Toronto couple consulted no fewer than six doctors and at one point, were spending $8,000 a month on in vitro fertilization, artificial insemination or hormone therapy, with only a small portion of that covered by Ontario's health plan. Debra's arms resembled pin cushions from the nine hormone shots she received daily.

Surrounded by family and other couples who were having babies, the Nefskys grew increasingly frustrated and resentful. Their marriage became strained. But they were not unique.

A happy mispachah: Lee and Debra Nefsky, with Joey, aged three, are pleased about having adopted through a Jewish agency. They are now on a waiting list for a second.

According to several studies, roughly one in five Jewish couples in North America is struggling with infertility. When Debra was finally told in 1992 that she would never get pregnant, "it was like a weight off my shoulders."

While the inability to bear children is heartbreaking for almost any couple, it poses a special burden for Jews, who are reminded constantly of the importance of children. The family is the centrepiece of Jewish holiday celebrations, synagogue and communal life. The burden is made heavier when placed under the weight of rising intermarriage, assimilation and a shrinking birthrate.

In fact, some feel infertility may be emotionally more difficult for Jews than for the general population. According to Rabbi Michael Gold, author of the watershed 1988 book And Hannah Wept: Infertility, Adoption and the Jewish Couple, Jews tend to marry later than others and put off having children longer. Women in their mid-30s are less fertile than in their 20s, and may experience difficulty conceiving by the time they decide to start a family.

The upshot? More and more Jewish couples are turning to adoption to fulfil the commandment, "Be fruitful and multiply." And they may take comfort in Talmudic teachings that the "real" parents of a child are those who nurture and teach him.

The Nefskys considered adoption as early as 1984. Two years later, they became number 50 on the waiting list at Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS). They had inquired at the Catholic agency and the Children's Aid Society of Metro Toronto, but were told that because they are both Jewish, they had to go to a Jewish agency. And there they stayed for the next seven years.

Following the required home study, the Nefskys were informed in 1993 that JF&CS had two children ready: A four-year-old and a four-month-old. In her giddiness, Debra, now 42, said she would take them both, but finally decided on the baby. She was given six hours to come get her son.

Here, the story takes a turn. For the baby, as with many children placed by public agencies, had major health problems. For one, it was born addicted to crack cocaine.

The baby's biological mother, who was Jewish, was a cocaine addict. She did not know who the father was.

The baby, recall the Nefskys, was severely underweight. His brain was thought to be expanding faster than his skull. He was lethargic and not given much of a chance to live.

"His head was completely flat in the back," Lee, a 40-year-old businessman, told The CJN in a recent interview. "We were told he wouldn't walk properly, could be blind, have poor motor skills and have a learning disability."

The baby went through painful withdrawal for a month. At 3½ months, he weighed 12 pounds.

But the connection with his new parents was instanteous, almost miraculous. It's a cliche, perhaps, but the Nefskys' love was like a balm. Today, Joey, as he's called, is a rambunctious, outgoing three-year-old who recited the alphabet at 20 months. The only health issue that lingers is the need to test him for AIDS once a year.

Despite their long wait and the bureaucratic maze they had to navigate, the Nefskys are happy with JF&CS. To couples considering adoption through a publicly-funded agency, they counsel perserverence, patience and honesty. It worked out so well for them that they're on the waiting list again for a second child.

The Nefskys and dozens of other childless Jewish couples in and around Metro Toronto chose to adopt with a public agency. Others, however, turn to accredited private practitioners, although the rules on private adoption vary from province to province. Still others opt to go to the United States or overseas for an international adoption, a more costly and generally faster route, but one which can bring its own problems of culture and acceptance. Each method has its merits and shortcomings.

Those who turn to adoption learn quickly that the process is often frustrating, sometimes expensive, but always fulfilling. And those who have adopted are likely to agree with author Judith Wine, when she advises in her book, The Canadian Adoption Guide, "Learn and work until you are successful. It is worth it. I promise."

Scarcity of babies

What is adoption? Essentially, it's a legal process that gives a child a new family. Note the order of words: A child a new family. Not the other way around. The focus of the law is on the child's rights and interests. Not long ago, adoption was thought to be a good idea only for babies. Today, there are far fewer babies to adopt and children of all ages are being adopted, some with special needs and some who have had disturbing experiences in their short lives.

Experts agree the scarcity of babies can be chalked up to better and more readily available birth control, the decreasing stigma of unmarried women raising children (one recent study found that 95 percent of single women in the United States who give birth keep their babies), and a sharp rise in abortions. One recent survey found that in Metro Toronto, the abortion rate for teenagers is 65 percent, one-third higher than 20 years ago.

Who adopts? According to the Vanier Institute of the Family in Ottawa, the "typical" adoptive applicant in Canada is white, Protestant, between 31 and 35 years old, infertile, and with at least a high school education. Except for the reference to religion, the definition pretty well holds true for Jews. Experts say infertility is the number one reason Jewish couples turn to adoption.

Support groups across North America note that many people struggling with infertility may feel angry and hurt — even abandoned by God. For them, there will be no pregnancy and childbirth, but rather, loss of self-esteem, both personal and sexual. Their genetic bloodline has been terminated, and for many Jewish couples, the most profound loss is that of generational continuity. An American psychologist, Aline Zoldbrod, has even written two prayers for Jews to help them cope with psychological wounds. One is for those who choose to remain childless, while the other is for those considering adoption.

They may resort to prayer, but today's adoptive parents must be flexible, honest and have Job-like patience. In some cases, to put it bluntly, they must also be ready to spend some money.

Public vs. private

Many young couples may be put off by the notion of private adoption, believing it involves cash passed to shady go-betweens and ultimately, to mothers who sell babies. There is no national law on adoption; it falls within provincial guidelines. But in most provinces, private adoption is tightly regulated and its practitioners — lawyers, social workers and counsellors who may charge fees — are fully licensed and accredited by the province. If they break the law, they are prosecuted.

In British Columbia, private adoptions have been unregulated. That will soon end. The province recently passed, but has yet to proclaim, its new Adoption Act, which is being hailed by experts as one of the most progressive in the world. Apart from regulating private practitioners, it will give birth parents greater access to information on would-be adoptive couples, and even remove barriers to adoption by common-law and same-sex couples.

In Quebec, there are no private adoptions. According to Linda Saks of Batshaw Youth and Family Services in Montreal, local adoptions are handled by public, religiously-defined agencies, which "contract out" international adoptions to licensed organizations. Those in turn are controlled by the Secrétariat à l'adoption internationale du Québec, an arm of the provincial government.

Ontario's Child and Family Services Act states that only Children's Aid societies (like JF&CS), agencies or individuals licensed by the province may place children for adoption.

Adoptions of children overseas are similarly regulated, with provincial rules combining with federal immigration laws and regulations in the host country, which may or may not be lax. Documents, home studies and legal papers must be in order before visas are issued and provinces give green lights.

So where to turn? It depends on the individual.

What makes public agencies attractive is that they charge no fees and offer extensive pre- and post-adoption support. But they also have far fewer available children than the number of couples who want them. It's not uncommon to be on a waiting list for five, six, even seven years, whether it's for an infant or a special needs child.

On average, Toronto's JF&CS places just eight children a year, three-quarters of whom are Jewish, according to Susan Brandes, the agency's adoption coordinator.

And where private practitioners are paid to find healthy babies — which they do in far greater numbers than the agencies — it falls to public institutions like JF&CS and Montreal's Jewish Family Services of the Baron de Hirsch Institute to find families for older children who may be Crown wards and in foster care. Public agencies also place the not so healthy: developmentally, learning or physically disabled children, and the physically sick — so-called special needs kids.

At JF&CS, the special needs category includes children who are over one year old. Of the eight children the agency placed last year, seven were special needs.

In other words, a healthy newborn, every couple's greatest desire, is a rare find at a public agency.

Saks says waiting lists at Montreal's Batshaw agency can also be years long, and many local Jewish couples are turning to "hot" overseas markets like China, Russia and Georgia. The agency placed "about a dozen" children for adoption last year, Saks noted.

Special Report

'Buyer beware'

Brandes of JF&CS says it's "buyer beware," even when it comes to adoption.

"A person who is in the process of adopting a child is a consumer. I don't mean to be crass, but just like any consumer item, you have to educate yourself. It's really up to the consumer to make himself knowledgeable."

Like other experts in the field, Brandes counsels would-be adoptive parents to explore other avenues. "The important thing in adoption now is spreading your net as widely as possible and using this agency as one option." An applicant, she points out, can be on a public and private waiting list at the same time.

And never underestimate the importance of networking. Brandes and others say couples should not be afraid to ask questions of those who have adopted successfully, tell everyone they know that they want to adopt, and even engage in what she calls "aggressive, ingenious behavior" — advertising, getting a 1-800 telephone line or sending letters to doctors stating their intent.

Contacting doctors is commonplace. One Metro family physician told The CJN that he used to file the dozens of letters he received from childless couples asking for introductions to unmarried, pregnant girls and women. But now, he said, he throws them away because there are too many of them, and besides, most of the unmarried pregnant girls he sees get abortions.

When it comes to adoption, demand far outstrips supply.

According to the National Adoption Study by University of Guelph professors Michael Sobel and Kerry Daly, over 12,000 Canadians pursued public adoption in 1990. In that year, 1,700 children under a year old were adopted publicly.

Ontario's Ministry of Community and Social Services reports that last year, the province approved 257 private adoptions and recommended approvals for some 600 international adoptions. There were 501 children adopted through Children's Aid societies.

Pat Fenton of the Adoption Council of Ontario says there can be seven applicants for every child available through a public agency, and three hopefuls for every child in the private domain.

The waiting game: Ted and Debbie Waters, frustrated, are considering adopting in China.

The scarcity of babies is the biggest single obstacle facing adoptive couples, says Michaele-Sue Goldblatt, a leading authority on private adoption. "A great many families are hoping to adopt a healthy, newborn white infant," she says flatly. "And why shouldn't they?"

Jewish children are even more scarce. Goldblatt, who now heads the Vancouver-based Child and Family Adoption Services Society, placed just two children born to Jewish mothers in her 11 years of private adoption practice in Ontario.

Couples going through public agencies may become "discouraged" when they discover that the children available often have been removed from their homes because of abuse or drugs and alcohol. In many instances, they are seriously troubled and have been given up, Goldblatt notes.

With proper counselling and support, some new parents can handle that. For others, it's too daunting.

And in private adoptions, it's not the go-between who decides which couple gets the baby. The birth parents decide.

In her practice, Goldblatt would meet the mother in the latter months of her pregnancy. Later, a selection of anonymous applicants would be presented to her.

By the time a meeting was set up, all parties were highly motivated and first names were exchanged. Rarely did a bad meeting happen. Sometimes, at later get-togethers, even the baby was present.

Open adoptions

That's another big difference between public and private adoptions: the growing acceptance in the private domain of fully open adoptions — adoptive and birth parents knowing each others' identities, exchanging letters and photographs, even keeping up direct contact. That's in stark contrast to public adoptions, where adoptive parents usually don't want to know about the birth parents, unless it's for a medical reason. (In Ontario and other provinces, the law prescribes only that birth parents are entitled to "non-identifying" information about the adopted family.)

Goldblatt unabashedly encourages open adoptions.

"It's becoming more and more the practice. Many adoptive parents are terrified at the prospect. They start out by saying no. But we say to them, 'This isn't joint custody. You're not a baby sitter or foster parent. It takes nothing away from you.'

"It's a gift where the benefits are fantastic. I've seen it work to an astonishing degree. The child grows up knowing who everybody is."

Although there have been no long-term studies on open adoption, Goldblatt says there's significant anecdotal evidence to suggest that knowing his or her birth parents lessens an adopted child's likelihood of an identity crisis later in life, and thus the need to launch difficult and emotional searches for a birth parent.

Open adoption may be fine for mailing baby pictures now and then and perhaps getting together for birthday parties, but what happens when there's a clash of cultures or values between the adoptive and birth parents?

"I'm not saying Jewish families should celebrate Christmas," Goldblatt explains. "I'm saying you can incorporate in a positive way the fact that the birth family is of a different heritage."

Goldblatt has also found that often, the birth parents' interest in the child wanes after the first few years. Some experts say that for an adopted child, that could result in feelings of being abandoned twice.

Public, private or international, all adoptions require a home study done by a qualified social worker. These are detailed snapshots of a couple's physical surroundings, finances, family and employment histories, medical records, parenting attitudes and many other variables.

Also standard in Ontario is the birth parents' right to withdraw their consent within 21 days of signing adoption papers. After that, a birth parent can go to court to regain custody, but this is rare.

The cost of a private adoption is normally in the $5,000 to $7,000 range, with fees going to process court documents, the home study, lawyers and foster care, if needed.

Goldblatt says red lights should go off if fees for a local adoption climb over $10,000, noting all provincial laws are clear that no one shall give or receive any payment or reward in connection with a child's adoption. It's a criminal offence to buy or sell a baby or profit from adoption, even under international rules, although the cost of adopting internationally can reach $30,000.

Patience 'running out'

An overseas adoption is something Ted and Debbie Waters are considering, partly because their patience is running out.

Ted, a 40-year-old Toronto store owner, and Debbie, 39, a program director, have been married for 17 years and have come to terms with their infertility. They joined JF&CS's list seven years ago and have been at the top of the list for an infant for two years. Now, they say they'll take whatever the agency has to offer.

"My patience has not run out with JF&CS," says Ted, with more than a hint of bitterness in his voice. "My patience with our society ran out a long time ago. My patience ran out with 15-year-old mothers who are encouraged to keep their children. My patience ran out when I took a night class at a local high school and there was a day care centre there. There's no excuse for that.

"We make it too easy for babies to keep babies and I've had enough of it."

The Waters have stuck by JF&CS partly because they've been put off by "horror stories" of baby-buying, of children with AIDS, and of birth mothers regaining custody months after an adoption is sealed.

The couple has explored foreign and private routes, but say they were quickly dropped when adoption officials discovered they didn't have enough money.

Ted says he got "quotes" of between $20,000 and $30,000 (US) for an American adoption. "If we had the money, we would have done it a long time ago," he says. But Debbie's view is tempered by the story of a couple in their support group who adopted a baby in Louisiana for $22,000 (US) and was handed the child through the door of a hotel room.

Now, like hundreds of other Canadians, the Waters are considering China, where baby girls especially are available for fees ranging from $12,000 to $16,000. That includes plane tickets, documents, the home study, legal fees and a hefty "donation" to a Chinese orphanage.

"I like my odds better," says Ted of finding a child in China.

In the meantime, the Waters wait for the phone to ring. "We figured since our home study was done [two years ago], we could get a call anytime," Debbie sighs. "And that's the frustration."

Russian Jewish woman's a doctor in the Arctic

By NETTA ZUKERMAN
Special to The CJN

The following story, The Eskimo who spoke Russian, describes an incident experienced by a Jewish Russian immigrant to Canada who had been a practising doctor for over 40 years.

When they came to Vancouver, Pauline Krivetskaia and her two sons, Alex and Gregori, became enthusiastic and active volunteers for the local Jewish Family Services Agency. "We want to help people," she said.

Jews throughout the centuries have been shunted around the world. The following story sketches Krivetskaia's first medical assignment in the Russian Arctic.

Stories related by recent immigrants are frequently both painful and sad. However, this account is quite different!

At the age of 24, Paulina Krivetskaia graduated as a doctor in Russia. Living in the former Soviet Union in the early '50s meant that all directives were issued by the government.

Krivetskaia was summoned before the medical board and given her first assignment — in Russian Alaska.

On Aug. 12, 1951, Krivetskaia, together with her nurse Sonya, left her native Kiev and arrived at Tanurar, a small village some 300 kilometres from Vladivostok. The tiny hospital boasted five beds and an Eskimo orderly named Ootic.

Krivetskaia, who was practical but high-spirited, relished the challenge of the Arctic. And in spite of the prevailing harsh conditions, she entered her new life with great enthusiasm.

One very cold day, an Eskimo named Katelo arrived at the hospital in a sled pulled by six dogs. He was immediately taken to her.

Could the doctor come quickly, he asked. His wife was expecting her first child shortly.

Visitors to Tanurar were a rarity and within minutes, the whole small community crowded around the hospital door. Hospitality was immediately forthcoming, but, anxious to return home to reassure his wife, Katelo thanked everyone and left.

Fortunately, at the time, there were no pressing cases in the hospital. Kala and Howmik, the two capable Eskimo women who had been trained as practical nurses by the doctor, were left in charge.

Under the guidance of Ootic, supplies were packed for the excursion. Medication, instruments and drugs were placed in one bundle; food for humans and dogs in another. Then, a small oil lamp and oil, a large enamel basin, caribou hides, blankets and fur covers.

It was her first home visit outside the village, but her calm exterior did not betray Krivetskaia's excitement. She loved the exuberance and vitality of the big husky dogs and the intelligence of their sapphire blue eyes.

It was a fine day; the sky was blue and the sun shone. Snuggled beneath the fur wraps, she and Sonia found the extreme coldness of the air invigoriating.

After they had driven 50 kilometres, Krivetskaia noticed small whirls of snow eddying upwards from the frozen ground. Before they could realize it, a strong wind had sprung up and within minutes, a full blizzard was raging. Everything was blotted out and the two women were unable to see even one another. They were left in total darkness. Ootic called a halt, though Krivetskaia insisted that they proceed.

But the Eskimo, in his halting Russian, said that if they continued further, they would all die. Reluctantly, she sanctioned the halt.

Ootic quickly commenced packing giant handfuls of snow and fashioning them into large bricks. Krivetskaia and Sonya watched, fascinated, while, within about half an hour, he built a snow igloo.

Krivetskaia then realized the value of the caribou skins. They were used to line the inside of the shelter, with furs placed over them on the ground.

The two women were ushered inside. The sled and supplies, together with the 10 dogs and Ootic followed. Once inside they were snug and warm.

For three days, the blizzard howled outside. Well, what of sanitation, washing, bathing? They did not wash. The enamel bowl was used for other purposes than that for which it had been destined. The dogs relieved themselves in their corner of the hut.

On the fourth day, the wind ceased and Ootic cautiously left the igloo to inspect the outside world. His face wreathed in smiles, he pronounced it safe to journey forth.

Olga thought that she now knew how it must have felt to have been able to leave Noah's Ark! With an air of jubilation, hastily, but methodically, everything was again bundled up.

The sky was imperturbably blue as they mounted the sled. It was 150 kilometres to Katelo's village. Krivetskaia and Sonya commenced singing Russian songs and the dogs bounded along with great exuberance. An air of festivity prevailed.

They entered the small village at a fast clip, Krivetskaia preparing herself mentally for her patient. Ootic quickly located the igloo.

As Krivetskaia pulled back her fur cover, the faint, thin wail of a newborn baby filled the air.

"Walk about Zion, and explore her;
Make note of her towers,
Mark well her ramparts,
Traverse her palaces;
That you may tell of Jerusalem to all the generations that follow."

(Psalms 48)

Passover Greetings

Peace descends on Sarajevo

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) will be helping Jews around the world celebrate Passover.

For the first time in four years, the Jews of Sarajevo will not hear the sound of shelling or sniper fire as they gather around the seder table. They will hold in their hands a special edition of the Haggadah, translated into Serbo-Croatian with commentary and explanations by their own Rabbi Ranko Jajcanin. This new translation was published by the JDC with the aid of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

The Haggadah states kol dichfin yeteh v'yechol (all who are hungry, let them come and eat). In this spirit, the elderly are the focus of this year's JDC Pesach programs in Kiev. Many of the seniors have not taken part in a seder since their childhood over 60 years ago.

Seders for them are being organized in over 30 communities, many of them former shtetls. The program is being carried out by JDC and Hesed Avot, the regional Jewish community welfare program for the northern Ukraine.

The seders will be arranged according to the bayit chaim (warm home) model. In Kiev, there are now 16 "warm homes" to which six or seven seniors come twice a week for a hot meal and to enjoy each others' company, in order to bring people out of their isolation.

In Kiev, 50 "warm homes" will be holding Pesach seders, each hosting 10 to 12 people.

JDC, Hillel and the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation have created a project mobilizing students to enrich local holiday celebrations in the former Soviet Union. Seventeen teams of Jewish students currently involved in Hillels will conduct communal seders and other holiday programs.

At training sessions, the three-person teams learn the background of the Pesach holiday, Pesach songs and dances, community activities and community building skills. They also learn about welfare issues. The teams will arrive in the local areas on the day before Pesach and stay through the holiday week. In addition to conducting seders, they will meet with a variety of local groups to discuss the traditions of the Pesach holiday and its contemporary message for post-Soviet Jews.

JDC-sponsored Pesach activities are also under way in Slovakia. Two traditional seder evenings for all age groups will be held at a local hotel. The Youth Club has scheduled a demonstration of matzah preparation and a talk describing the necessary preparations for Pesach. The Jewish community of Bratislava is planning a Pesach dinner for the elderly at their local kosher kitchen.

For the holiday in India, JDC staff will assist in public seders in Bombay, Alibag, Pune and Ahmadabad. A Haggadah translated into Marathi is being mailed out to Jewish families throughout India and JDC is bringing kosher matzah from Israel for the public seders.

In Morocco, Pesach packs are being distributed to 350 families.

"What's the big deal about searching for Chometz? We do it every day of our lives!"

"This is a city never indifferent to the sky. The evenings often feel like Kol Nidre nights. Unheard music, transfiguring thoughts. Prayers are vibrant. The Sabbath finds it hard to go away."

Spirit of Miriam, women of Judaism imbue Haggadah

By NECHAMA TAMLER
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

In the spirit of full disclosure, I'd like to state up front my predilection toward the newly revised Dancing with Miriam Haggadah: A Jewish Women's Celebration of Passover (Rikudei Miriam, $9.95 US).

For those of us who place Judaism and feminism at the core of our identities, what could be more engaging? I'm glad to report this Haggadah doesn't disappoint. Written by local feminists Elaine Moise and Rebecca Schwartz, the book was first published in 1995 and re-issued this year.

The introductory section, Why Dancing With Miriam? is as good an eight-page introduction to the Jewish feminist movement as one can find. Responding to how Jewish women can "fully participate in the glorious heritage of Judaism when the tradition has denied them access for so many centuries," the authors say Jewish feminism attempted to create a "mode of religious expression that celebrates" both Judaism and womanhood together.

"Rather than struggle with the dichotomy of Judaism versus feminism, why not create a Jewish feminism that validates the authenticity of each without forcing an impossible choice?"

Assessing this blended ideology, the authors conclude: "All things must grow and change in order to live. As women recreate Judaism, they add a new energy to the substance of the tradition in which Judaism and feminism are joined together as one dynamic and powerful whole ..."

The Haggadah has several other prefaces discussing the Pesach 1994 event in Palo Alto that gave birth to this volume. It also contains a section outlining the thinking behind new feminist blessings, using such phrases as Ruach ha-olam (Life's breath of the universe) rather than Melech ha-olam (King of the universe). Finally, the introductory sections conclude with instructions on preparing for the seder oneself.

The Haggadah is well organized and easy to follow. Moise and Schwartz engaged the talents of illustrator Sherrie Smith to add graphics and perform hiddur mitzvah (enhancing the performance of a commandment by making the ritual objects used as beautiful as possible).

The Haggadah also provides the voices of Jewish women from history, each bringing forth her own message. We hear from Emma Lazarus, Emma Goldman, Anne Frank and Beruriah of the Talmud, together with biblical personalities such as Deborah, Hannah, Esther and Naomi.

The authors also add opportunities for less structured Pesach discussions, dealing with open-ended Exodus questions, such as "What do we wish to leave behind with our tears in Egypt?" and "What shall we take with us on our journey into the Wilderness?"

Other topics focus on both feminist and spiritual concerns, asking questions that will provoke substantive discussions.

Along with the three seder plate symbols traditionally discussed at Pesach – the lamb shank, the matzah and the maror (bitter herb), the authors share their observations on the egg, "an obvious choice for a spring symbol." They ask: "Why is the egg ignored? Was its meaning so obvious that it didn't need mentioning?"

One would expect a feminist Haggadah to pay special attention to the women in the Pesach story itself – to Miriam, to Yocheved (the mother of Moses), to Shifrah and Pu'ah (the midwives), and to Pharoah's daughter, who becomes Moses' adoptive mother.

Moise and Schwartz have not disappointed us. Instead of inviting in Elijah at the appropriate time, this Haggadah instructs us to welcome in Miriam and fill the cup of Miriam with water from everyone's glasses.

We learn that "the well of Miriam followed the children of Israel throughout their journey in the wilderness, and sustained them with water."

The prayer is that the cup of Miriam will always be overflowing with water, which is likened to wisdom.

"On the holy mount stands the city he founded,
The Lord loves the gates of Zion
more than all the dwelling places of Jacob.
Glorious things are spoken of you,
O City of God..."

(Psalm 87:1)

Playful new Haggadah still takes Passover seriously

By SHERWOOD WEINGARTEN
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

It dares ask – on its dustjacket, yet – the burning question, "Why is this haggadah different from all other haggadahs?"

Then, with leavened humor aimed at smart kids, The Doodled Family Haggadah (Atara Publishing) dares to offer some answers:

• It's not boring like the ones without pictures.

• It isn't as dry as matzah.

• Every page is like a comic book – colorful and real interesting.

• It has games, facts and other cool stuff for the days after the seder night.

• It's so authentic, you'll feel as if you too had gone through the slavery and Exodus from Egypt.

• It doubles as a remote spy transmitter that you can use to communicate with secret agents around the world (this doesn't always work).

In this Haggadah, noted artist Reudor, a seventh-generation Israeli, uses his full-color Doodled Family cartoon characters to add light touches to the ever-serious Passover story. At the same time, he delivers a comprehensive version of the Exodus.

For Hebrew readers, there's a traditional text (although no transliteration is offered for the less-than-fluent). For other readers, Reudor provides a modern English translation.

But be forewarned: Some readers might find a spoof or two in this Haggadah downright offensive.

For instance under the heading Guide for the Perplexed (and the Somewhat Confused), one cartoon depicts a youngster in scuba-diving garb telling his classmates, "Today I will demonstrate how the Israelites were able to safely cross the Red Sea while fleeing the Egyptians. See, the key was that HaShem outfitted the Jewish people with state-of-the-art equipment thousands of years ahead of its time."

Readers may also dislike the fact that Reudor occasionally strains too hard at cleverness, and that he seems to feel he must cram something into every last smidgen of space. He loops spiritual ideas around drawings, mingles erudition with trivia and juxtaposes ritual directions with definitions.

Yet for all these potential faults, the Haggadah is a melange that will please many.

According to Reudor, before the invention of the printing press, "most people could not afford a handwritten Haggadah and had to memorize [the Pesach story]."

In the category called Matzah Facts, he notes that "sometimes the three matzot are referred to as Kohen, Levi and Israel, after the three types of Jews. Others say [they] represent our three patriarchs: Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

His text tells us that "on the evening before the holiday we inspect the house one last time. To make the search more exciting, we place 10 pieces of chametz throughout the house."

Chametz, he continues, "symbolizes the yetzer hara, the evil inclination. [It also] reminds us how difficult it is to overcome and get rid of our own bad habits."

Toward the end of the volume, there are descriptions of holiday games, Passover versions of charades, tug of war (representing "the great struggle of wills between Moses and Pharaoh") and nut-tossing (which combines children's desires to throw food and to win games).

A final two-page section titled The Passover Encyclopedia informs us that "in Ashkenazi communities the seder leader wears a white robe, embroidered with gold and silver, known as a kittel, [to remind] us of the white clothes the High Priest wore in the Temple."

In contrast, "the rugged mountain Jews of [the] Caucasus listen to their Elder read the Haggadah while dressed in their best clothing and armed with their finest weapons."

Anyone armed with The Doodled Family Haggadah, meanwhile, will have a cache of Pesach information at his or her fingertips – not to mention a unique, fun-packed book that just might keep the toddlers awake.

And if it does, readers then might consider showing them the cartoon that Reudor links to the song Chad Gadya. Its inscription reads: "And a heavenly voice said, 'Nu, enough already with all this chaos!' "

Tragedies should lead to understanding priorities

By MAURY KELMAN

This was supposed to be a light article, but Feb. 25 at 6:45 a.m. changed that. Yet life went on until the next Sunday morning when I was awakened by a radio broadcast reporting that Bus #18 had been blown up.

"Why," I asked myself, "were they repeating last week's news?"

And then, my eyes slowly opening and brain suddenly coming to life, the full horror overwhelmed me. I lay frozen in bed, hypnotized by the shaken reports describing the carnage and relating the mounting numbers of confirmed dead. My eyes were open, my ears heard the tragic sounds, and yet I could not comprehend that this feeling of deja vue was in fact reality.

One of the victims of the Feb. 25 bombings in Jerusalem was a 19-year-old French girl who had spent a peaceful Shabbat at her cousins' home off Jaffa Street across from Zion Square. Calyne Zagury was on her way back to Bar-Ilan University where she had just begun studying after making aliyah in the summer. Her parents in Paris were summoned to Israel after the bombing and upon arrival had to wait for several hours at the Forensics Institute before their daughter's body was positively identified. When I heard of this specific tragedy, I felt that I had to visit the family, even though I had never met Calyne.

I had made my decision to visit before the second bombing, one week later on March 3, and now, as I neared the apartment, I tried to imagine the family's reaction to the latest tragedy. Their apartment was literally one block away from the second bomb site. Can any of us imagine what they must have felt, when they heard the second blast, having just buried their eldest child four days ago? I imagined they would be broken and angry, anxious to leave this city which for them was a place of so much sorrow and fear.

After entering the apartment, I was taken into the den where family members were huddled around the television watching reports of the grisly scene, which with sickening irony they could have seen from their own building. I thought how strange it was that people so far away in Canada, physically removed from this dreadful reality, were watching the same scenes as this family who should have been in Paris also watching the tragedy from the safety of their home. Instead, they were wrenched from their comfortable residence into this misery, their lives cruelly altered forever.

And yet, I found that the Zagury family was not angry or bitter. They spoke of their daughter lovingly and of her love of Israel. It was both of these loves, they told me, which had strengthened their determination to return to Israel permanently in the near future.

With my broken French and the father's broken English, I was sure that I had misunderstood. Surely he meant that this tragedy had convinced them not to live in Israel. But then he said it again and I was dumbfounded. Calyne's brother, aged 16, was anxious to come and the parents wanted to be close to their daughter, now eternally linked to the land of Israel.

I was awed by the parents' remarkable display of control and by their determination to vicariously live their daughter's dream. After I told the father that I was from Toronto, he perked up, declaring that he had lived in Toronto for one year and his parents had lived there for two. He excitedly called his father over, and thus began the age-old tradition of Jewish geography or mishpachology, as my uncle coined it, began.

They asked if I knew their relatives still living in Toronto. "Yes, the name sounds familiar, but even though I don't know him, I'm sure my father does," I responded, as I often do when people ask me if I know one of Toronto's 160,000 Jews.

So there we sat in Jerusalem, a group of Jews from Paris and Toronto discussing Bathurst Street and the Jewish Community Centre, while a surreal sense of death and tragedy pervaded the room. For the Zagurys, momentarily escaping the horror of the present, it was a chance to talk with a stranger about a simpler past in a peaceful land far away from depraved suicide murderers. And yet, even though I was a stranger and had just met the family, I felt a certain closeness to them, that amorphous, yet real attachment that should bind all Jews together regardless of background or language.

They were appreciative of my coming, and kept offering me something to drink or eat. "Why are they serving me?", I thought. "It should be the other way around." We spoke some more about Israel, about Calyne, about their commitment to Israel and Judaism, and then it was time to go. I felt guilty leaving the apartment, as if it wasn't right to continue my daily existence while the Zagurys' lives were changed forever.

The Zagurys are back in France now, and like the almost 60 other families who lost loved ones in these inexplicable calamities, must now go on with their lives. Ultimately, after the shivah visits and the calls to "just see how you're coping," we too must resume our own lives. We cannot understand these tragedies, nor can we really learn from them, except perhaps to understand our priorities better, perhaps to take more time to care for our fellow human beings, perhaps to better appreciate our loved ones, perhaps to pray more, perhaps to act more. Perhaps ...

"Rejoice with Jerusalem, and be glad for her, all you who love her."
(Isaiah 66:10)

The Dead's seder mythology dies along with the band

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The Grateful Dead may be gone as a musical group since the death last year of its leader Jerry Garcia, but Jewish-related mythology about the much-beloved band lives on.

The Dead's large Jewish following has long speculated about the religious practices of Mickey Hart, the only Jewish member of the Dead and the band's drummer.

He is rumored to have been the guiding force behind the annual Passover seder that the Dead held backstage each spring when they played in New York City. It was a 45-minute gig between the sound check and the opening of the show.

The band's publicist, Dennis McNally, said the abbreviated seder was enjoyed by about 20 members of the Dead entourage, including sound guys and roadies, but that Hart would show up only for about five minutes of the ritual.

The seder participants were provided with special yarmulkes made of purple suede and stamped in gold with the Dead's signature "Steal Your Face" logo.

The Haggadot bore the same logo, and became a hot collectible among Jewish Dead fans, said Deadhead Myles Share.

One of the yarmulke-and-Haggadah sets was sold at a synagogue auction in Marin County, Calif., for $500, he said.

Many of the Dead's Jewish fans claimed that the band scheduled shows in New York around Passover and Yom Kippur each year so that Hart could be with his mother for the holidays.

Grateful Dead spokesperson Dennis McNally denied that report, calling it "a folk tale."

Hart was unavailable for comment, busy in the studio in the final stages of mixing his latest solo album.

But his personal assistant, Howard Cohen, set the record straight about Hart's Passover seder style.

"In the seven years I've known him, he's never had a seder," said Cohen. "He's not really what you'd call a practising Jew."

McNally, the Dead's publicist, agreed. "Mickey is a drummer," he said. "He worships the beat. His religion is percussion."

DOUBLE MAROR

This is a special seder plate from mid 19th century Czechoslovakia in which maror (bitter herbs) is mentioned twice: l'vracha, for the blessing, and l'cricha, for the sandwich. [Fred Weinberg photo]

A time for Israelis to see the country

By CARL ALPERT

The observance of Pesach in Israel is not limited to the seder night (only one for Israelis). In the days following the seder, tens of thousands of Israelis will take to the road, visiting and even camping out in Eilat, around the Dead Sea, at the Kinneret and at every available camping and picnic site.

Conspicuous among these internal tourists will be religious families. Not free to travel on Shabbat, they eagerly grasp at the opportunity to get about the country during chol hamo'ed, the intervening days of Passover. Even the yeshivot are closed during this week.

Experience of previous years has shown that the effects of the holiday can be felt some time before the actual seder. The traditional thorough housecleaning expresses itself in the discarding of vast amounts of junk. The city sanitation department in Jerusalem reports that in recent days their collections have averaged about 1,500 tons a day, as against an average of 700 tons at other times.

Hospital emergency wards and clinics, relying on past experience, have for some days been on special alert to take care of the victims of home accidents, chief among them falls from ladders or unsteady chairs.

Surveys indicate that about 70 percent of the Jewish population will observe the kashrut laws and refrain from introducing chametz into their homes. While the usual markets and groceries will have only matzah on sale, some Israelis will seek out Arab outlets where bread (pita) will be available. A local Haifa paper provides a list of such stores. Ironically, one such source of pita is located on Eliyahu Hanavi Street.

As in the past, canine pets will be able to consume dog food strictly kosher for Passover, especially marketed for families who do not want to have non-kosher food in their homes during the holiday.

The big zoo in Jerusalem will presumably, like last year, also be kosher for Passover, and the animals will be fed a diet meeting the strictest requirements, so as not to violate esthetically the feelings of the large numbers of religious Jews who visit during the week.

In prisons and all army camps, the kitchens have been scrubbed clean and only foods with proper certification will be served. Packages sent to soldiers from home will not be released from the army mails until after the holiday.

Weight watchers have already been warned that one piece of matzah contains 160 calories, equivalent to two slices of bread. Two kneidlach contain 150 calories.

As in previous years, Jerusalem's water supply will be drawn from Yarkon springs, rather than from the national water carrier which receives its water from the Kinneret. Religious sources have in the past complained that water in the lake becomes chametz because of the bread bait used by fishermen. Rabbi Ovadia Yosef has dismissed this fear, but religious perfectionists want to take no chances.

The collective ritual "sale" to an Arab of all chametz owned by the government will be watched carefully this year after it was revealed that Ahmed Mugrabi, who in the past had been the purchaser, was actually the son of a Jewish mother.

To tens of thousands of employees of major institutions, Passover is the time when their company gives them valuable gifts or pays them special bonuses which often mount up to appreciable sums.

The day after Passover, Israelis of North African descent will set out their festive tables loaded with delicacies in celebration of their traditional Mimouna holiday, which has become a national folk festival.

But not all Israelis will be at home. This festival marks the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt, and many of the modern Israelis take the "exodus" literally, by going on trips abroad during the long holiday. Indications are that in excess of 50,000 Israelis will be away from the country during this period. Every available plane and flight has been booked, and it is expected that on the eve of the holiday, all records for departure will be broken at Ben-Gurion Airport, with a plane departing every five or six minutes.

The most popular destination is London, but there is hardly a corner of the world where Israelis will not be found. Many young people heading for exotic destinations in the Far East expect to take part in special seders arranged by the Chabad movement. Last year no less than 500 Israeli backpackers munched matzah and asked the four questions at a seder in Bangkok, Thailand. The Israeli seder in Katmandu, Nepal, is already a tradition of some years standing.

Wherever you are, celebrate the feast — and watch those calories.

"This is the city of David, of the prophets of Israel — not of Titus, the Roman Emperor; or of Godfrey of Bouillon, the Crusader; or of Saladin. The descendents of Titus, of Godfrey, of Saladin never fasted, never mourned for her. Jerusalem was not a part of their soul, of the grief, not an answer to their suffering."
Israel: an echo of eternity, A. J. Heschel

Ethiopian Jews are a real modern miracle for Pesach

By BARBARA RIBAKOVE GORDON

Each year at the Passover seder we are told to think of the Exodus from Egypt as if it happened to us in our own time. It did happen in our time, when almost 15,000 Ethiopian Jews crossed the Red Sea and came home to Israel. This great miracle of the 20th century was not the first effort at aliyah by Ethiopian Jews. The following is a story that you may want to include in your Passover seder:

It came to pass in the reign of Emperor Thedorus (king of Ethiopia from 1855-1868), when the Jews of Ethiopia were led by the wise Aba Mahari, that much anguish came upon the Jewish community. Missionaries were active in their villages, troubling the spirits of the Jewish people. Then a decree went out from the emperor that the Jews must come to his court and debate the missionaries.

Now, Aba Mahari was a man of 60 years. Some say he himself led the great debate in the emperor's court. Others say he sent his wisest counselors. But all agree the Jews were the victors, and the missionaries became enraged, threatening force against them. And the people were afraid.

Now, Aba Mahari had a dream that the Jews would go to Jerusalem. He dressed in his long white robes, took his staff in his hand, and went to Emperor Theodorus. The emperor received him kindly, for Aba Mahari had foretold that he would be king while he was yet unborn. The emperor said to Aba Mahari, "You are like my father," if you will change your religion you shall be head of the Ethiopian church but Aba Mahari said, "I cannot do as you ask. Therefore, I ask you to send me to Jerusalem with my people. Let me take them home."

And Emperor Theodorus consented, and issued a decree that no one should hinder the Jews.

And so word went out to the Jewish villages in Gondar, Dembia, Tigrei, Quara and everywhere in Ethiopia – all those who wished to remain Jews should follow Aba Mahari. And so thousands of Jews walked in the footsteps of Aba Mahari, toward the shores of the Red Sea.

But the long road was filled with obstacles, rivers and mountains. The rainy season came and many Jews perished of cold and hunger. In the village of Madvay there is to this day a great memorial to the Jews buried there. And the good people of Madvay sought to comfort the Jews by holding a tazkar (memorial service) for the dead. Some of the Jews were indeed comforted and turned back saying, "It is as if we have reached Jerusalem. Why? We have heard all your singing, all your praying, all your beating of drums, and we have rejoiced."

But many did not turn back, and went on till they came to the shores of the Red Sea. Then Aba Mahari took his staff, like Moses, and struck the sea so it would open. But the sea did not open. Then those who remembered the story of Nahson at the time of the Exodus from Egypt – for Nahson walked boldly into the waters, and they parted – they leaped into the sea and began to swim.

Still the waters did not part, and they returned to shore, saying, "Even if we swim to the other sides how can the women and children cross, and those who can't swim?" So they sought a rich woman who lived nearby, to hire her boats, but her boats were not strong enough.

Then the people lost heart, and turned away from Jerusalem to go home. And the journey south was more arduous than the journey north, for plague broke out and many died. To this day none can tell how long the Jews underwent the vicissitudes, the sufferings and the deaths of their companions, before they reached their homes, or settled where they fell. And Aba Mahari, it is said, spent the rest of his life wandering from place to place, to comfort his people and to defend Judaism in Ethiopia.

And so ended the first great exodus of the Jews of Ethiopia. Some might say that the vicissitudes, the sufferings, and the deaths were in vain, for the Jews did not cross the Red Sea. But to this day, their descendants tell the story, and remember not only the pain their ancestors suffered, but the kindness they met along the way, and the courage of Aba Mahari who walked before them in his old age and did not leave them defenceless.

And today, their descendants who are indeed in the Land of Israel and the City of Jerusalem –who crossed the Red Sea in our time, not on land but in the air, borne on the wings of eagles – they say, "Aba Mahari had a vision, and the vision was true. But what he saw was not for his time but for the future. They did not arrive, they were not privileged to reach their goal.

"But because of their courage and their virtue — we, their children, have arrived."

Now, there are 56,000 Ethiopian Jews living in Israel. In Ethiopia, 3,400 impoverished Ethiopian Jews, who have spent five years in the slums of Addis Ababa, celebrate the Passover holiday while awaiting their turn to leave for Israel.

Conflicting memories struggle for supremacy in Haggadah

By IRVING GREENBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Two types of memory struggle for supremacy in the Passover seder. The memory of degradation and slavery clashes with the memory of liberation and freedom.

Which memory will primarily shape the retelling?

The seder story begins with poverty and hunger – matzah, "the bread of affliction." It descends into slavery – "we were slaves unto Pharaoh in Egypt." Then it sinks into genocide – "the drowning of the children."

To remember slavery and genocide evokes deep feelings – feelings of rage and victimization. Our ancestors – Jacob and his children – brought blessings to Egypt. Yet in the end, the Egyptians mercilessly repressed us, enslaved us, killed us.

Slavery defines the people as exploited; they must have a master at all times. When Moses is gone for a few days too long, the people create a golden calf to worship. When there is no water – or no meat – they wish they were back in slavery.

There is a truth behind this approach. The experience of slavery defined the Jewish people. In struggling with the oppression, the Israelites proliferated.

Still, in the final analysis, when the memory of slavery is dominant, it drags the people down to servility, to internalized degradation. Such a memory breeds victimization psychology.

When we go wrong, we blame those who distorted our culture and destroyed our lives. We define ourselves in conflict with enemies who still seek to destroy us.

There is an alternative approach. The Jewish people was born in slavery, but it was born again in the process of liberation. "I ... take you out from under the afflictions of Egypt ... [and] I take you to be My people." (Exodus 6:6-7)

From the first remembrance instruction – "Remember this day that you went out of Egypt from the house of bondage" (Exodus 13:3) – to the last – "You shall not subvert the rights of the stranger or the orphan" because "you shall remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt and the Lord God redeemed you from there" (Deuteronomy 24: 17-18, 20-22), the Torah came down decisively on the side of liberation, not slavery.

The Haggadah also puts the emphasis on freedom. The core of the seder is that "in every generation a person must see him/herself as though he/she personally came out of Egypt." Responsibility, not rage, is the dominant message.

This even leaves room for forgiveness. Consider the commandment: "Do not abhor an Egyptian, for you were a stranger in his land."(Deuteronomy 23:8)

This resolution shaped Judaism into a religion of life. As a result, Passover turned into the most influential holiday of all time. Each generation and each people must resolve this issue again.

After the Shoah, the Jewish people had to decide whether the focus would be on Jewish victimization or the affirmation of the renewed lives of survivors. Jews had to choose between staying powerless or proclaiming a state. They could develop a policy of self-pity and rage toward all gentiles or take power and act responsibly toward gentile and Jew alike.

Choosing life, power and responsibility has been the remarkable achievement of this generation.

Now Jews must decide whether to cling to a self-definition dependent on gentile rejection or to take up the challenge of freedom. The proper response to acceptance is to develop a liberating, life-affirming Jewish experiential way of life.

To cling to the victim's role, to define ourselves by the nonacceptance of others spells internalization of inferiority and dissolution into assimilation.

To focus on freedom, beginning with celebrating Passover, is the path to life. The revitalization of Jewish life through learning and Jewish growth is the sign that we are free at last.

THE WESTERN WALL 80 YEARS AGO

This photo captures the scene at the Western Wall on Tisha b'Av, 1915. It poignantly captures the keening, the sadness, and the sorrowful feelings felt by these women of Jerusalem, mourning over what was lost 1,845 years earlier. [Photo by J. Ben-Dov, reproduced from Ariel ,1975]

EXTEND THEIR GOOD WISHES
FOR A HAPPY PASSOVER

So, it snowed last week. Don't worry, Spring hasn't been cancelled, it's just been delayed.

(Which makes it a lot like our new Lawrence Plaza store.)

We're sorry for the delay in moving to our new second storey location at Lawrence Plaza. We promise it's going to open soon. And when it does it's going to be a lot bigger with a lot more of what you love about Winners. More women's wear, men's wear, kids' wear, accessories, as well as giftware and houseware. But until then we've made sure that our original Lawrence Plaza location is stocked twice a day with a vast selection of current brand name designer Spring fashions. And all for 20 to 60% less than what you'd find in a department store. So don't worry if it doesn't feel like Spring yet when you go outside. With all the wonderful designer Spring fashions waiting for you inside any one of our 17 Toronto locations, you'll have no doubt that Spring is truly here.

Great Spring fashion is still arriving twice a day at our original store.

Winnipegger marks 100 years

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — About 80 family members, friends and shul goers were at the Chavurat Tefilah Synagogue recently to celebrate the birthday of the north Winnipeg synagogue's oldest member. Sarah Weisman (née Hamovich) turned 100 on March 14.

The oldest of six children, Weisman came to Canada with her family in 1908. From 1916 to 1967, she and her husband, the late Jack Weisman, operated Weisman Confectionery on Main Street.

From her earliest adult years, Sarah Weisman has been active in the Jewish community. She was a charter member of her synagogue's sisterhood, which evolved into a welfare organization that provided matzah and other foods for the needy.

When the Jewish Welfare Fund was formed and the sisterhood program was incorporated into it, she continued to work through the new community organization.

She volunteered for the Jewish Child and Family Services (of which she is a life member) delivering ma'ot chittin every year. (Her daughter, Ros Silver, notes that Weisman was one of the first Jewish women in Winnipeg to drive a car.)

100-year-old Sarah Weisman flanked by son Dr. Harvey Weisman and daughter Ros Silver.

She was also been a member of B'nai Brith Women (Jewish Women International).

Weisman and her daughter and son-in-law, Ros and Meyer Silver, were among the earliest members of the Chavurat Tefilah (which is almost 25 years old) and she attended services regularly into her early 90s. She currently resides in the Sharon Home.

"Over the past five years," Ros Silver notes, "my mother has knitted 80 afghans, enough for every member of the family and great-grandchildren still to be born. She learned to knit and sew as a girl. She used to sew all our clothes."

In commemoration of her birthday, the Silvers presented the Chavurat Tefilah with a new cover for the table on which the Torah is read. It matches the cover for the Aron Kodesh that commemorates her 90th birthday and the new cover for one of the sifrai Torah that marks her 95th birthday.

Weisman had a birthday party at the Sharon Home and another party at the Rosh Pina Gardens. Other family members are son and daughter-in-law, Dr. Harvey and Sondra Weisman, and son-in-law Louis Slutchuk. Her daughter, Faye Slutchuk, died 12 years ago. She also has seven grandchildren and 14 great-grandchildren.

Hamilton Negev Dinner to honor Arthur Weisz

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Hamilton Jewish National Fund (JNF) has named Arthur Weisz as the 1996 Negev Tribute Dinner honoree.

The guest speaker at the June 17 event will be Nobel Peace Prize winner, Elie Wiesel.

Proceeds from the dinner will go to support Yad Layeled, a children's Holocaust museum located in Kibbutz Lohamei Haghetaot in the Western Galilee.

Weisz, founder and chair of Effort Trust, a real estate company and asset management and financial services conglomerate, was born in Hungary.

He married his childhood sweetheart, the former Margaret Stadler, in 1944, but they were separated by the Holocaust immediately after the wedding. Both survived concentration camps.

In 1951, the couple arrived in Hamilton with their first child, penniless and without knowing any English. Weisz first found work as a bricklayer's helper and a tailor. Two years later, he became a real estate salesman before forming his own company.

He has been the driving force behind many charitable and educational projects, including the JNF and State of Israel Bonds and programs at Temple Anshe Sholom and McMaster University.

Weisz was also instrumental in the foundation of Shalom Village residence and Shalom Village Nursing Home and continues to be a member of the board of directors.

The Weisz' two children, Thomas and Dr. Janet Weisz Asa, will serve as dinner chairs. The couple have five grandchildren.

Goldblatt remembered as mentor for journalists

By PAUL McKEAGUE
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Murray Goldblatt was much more than a teacher. He was a friend, a mentor and an inspiration to hundreds of journalists across the country.

A veteran newspaperman with a crusty manner and a twinkly eye, Goldblatt left a lasting mark on the news business as a professor at Carleton University's School of Journalism for 18 years.

There was a sense of loss in newsrooms from coast to coast when Goldblatt died recently of a stroke, at the age of 73.

Speaking at the funeral service at the Jewish Community Memorial Chapel, journalist Anthony Westell said Goldblatt made three major contributions to Canadian journalism.

The first was as a pioneer in establishing the Newspaper Guild . After joining the Ottawa Citizen in 1948, Goldblatt became a founding member and then president of the guild's Ottawa local.

Goldblatt stood up to employers to receive better wages and working conditions for journalists and this "made it easier to attract the right people into it," said Westell.

Goldblatt's second big contribution was as an editor. With his "vast general knowledge" and his knack for pushing reporters to do better, he was "superlatively good" as the Globe and Mail's national editor in the 1960s, Westell said.

Before then he had worked for papers ranging from the Hamilton Spectator and the Oshawa Times-Gazette to the Toronto Star.

Goldblatt's third contribution, after becoming a full-time professor in 1973, was as a teacher who developed a special relationship with many of his students, Westell said. Goldblatt would coach them, help them get started in the business and keep in touch for years afterward, as he enthusiastically followed their careers.

Students were drawn to him not only by his experience but also by his warmth, loyalty and puckish sense of humor.

One former student, CBC broadcaster Matt Maychak, noted that Goldblatt "had a sense of mischief about him that many of us lose as we grow up."

A Hamilton native, Goldblatt was a devoted fan of the Canadian Football League's Tiger Cats. He followed their play "as closely as the team's coaches," recalled CBC broadcaster Don Newman, who worked under Goldblatt when he was Ottawa bureau chief of the Globe and Mail.

After he retired from Carleton University in 1991, Goldblatt worked as a desk editor for the Hill Times, Parliament Hill's weekly newspaper.

Newspapers were his passion. "One seldom saw him without a bundle of newspapers under his arm," Westell recalled at the funeral service which was filled with Goldblatt's former students. "I like to think that wherever he is now he's finding time to read those newspapers."

Goldblatt is survived by his wife Sylvia and his children Lynn in Vancouver, Mark in Ottawa and Ann in Edmonton.

Jewish Agency criticized for ending Yiddish journal

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — At its annual conference, the Winnipeg Committee for Yiddish and Yiddish Culture focused on critical issues locally and abroad.

The first resolution, read aloud by committee member Itzy Victor, deplored the actions of the Jewish Agency in Jerusalem for closing its monthly journal People and Zion, withdrawing its annual $10,000 donation for Yiddish to the World Congress of Yiddish and Yiddish Culture, evicting the Congress from the Jewish Agency building in Tel Aviv and discouraging the teaching of Yiddish in Jewish schools the agency subsidizes in Russia, Ukraine and other countries.

The second conference resolution was a demand that the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (WBJE) re-establish Yiddish as an integral part of the curriculum of the WBJE's north Winnipeg Talmud Torah-Peretz School. Keynote speaker Matt Bellan, editor of the weekly Jewish Post and News, spoke on the issue.

The teaching of Yiddish was discontinued two years ago when the school's longtime Yiddish teacher, Aviva Katz, retired. According to Bellan, the WBJE claimed a survey showed that parents didn't want Yiddish taught in the school any more. The survey, however, only asked parents if they would support an after-school Yiddish program.

"All the parents I have spoken to want Yiddish taught as part of the curriculum," Bellan said.

The WBJE has advertised for a part-time Yiddish teacher — so far without success. The Committee for Yiddish has scholarship money available for individuals interested in attending seminars for Yiddish teachers in New York and Israel.

Noach Witman, the committee's executive secretary, reports that the conference attracted over 50 people.

"We have had a successful year," he says. "We have put on two Yiddish concerts. We have a group that meets every third Thursday of the month at the Gwen Sector Creative Living Centre. There has also been a younger group formed at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue."

Witman, 92, continues to write a weekly Yiddish column in the Jewish Post and News and host a weekly radio show and a regular television show on cable.

Schneider adds quickness to Leafs defence

'Brings an abundance of offensive skills'

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Well, he's done it.

A few games after coming over from the New York Islanders in a mega-trade orchestrated by Toronto Maple Leaf wheeler-dealer Cliff Fletcher, defenceman Mathieu Schneider has scored his first goal for the Maple Buds.

Have they forgotten about Kenny whatshisname yet?

For Schneider, arguably the key figure in the trade that sent Kenny Jonsson, Sean Haggerty, Darby Hendrickson and a 1997 No. 1 draft pick to the Island for him and Wendel Clark, coming to Toronto is a lot like going back to Montreal.

There's tremendous pressure to perform in both cities, said the 26-year-old native of New York. "It's just like Montreal. There's a lot of great hockey tradition in the city. The focus of the city is on hockey ... It's a similar atmosphere here, except I understand everything that's written about me."

Before he was dealt, Schneider had heard trade rumors and he had an inkling a deal was brewing that would bring him to Toronto.

A personable, soft-spoken young man in an interview, Schneider is aggressive and focused on the ice, blending solid, if unspectacular, work in his own zone with the ability and temperament to move the puck quickly and join the rush.

In 70 games this season, Schneider has bulged the twine for 11 goals and added 38 assists, placing him fourth in scoring among Leafs, ahead of wingers Mike Gartner, Wendel Clark, Dave Gagner and ex-Leaf Dave Andreychuk.

Although he's minus 18 in the plus/minus column (accumulated with a weak Islanders team), assistant GM Bill Watters suggests Schneider rates among the top 15 defencemen in the National Hockey League.

"I don't think there's any question he's in the top 15. You only have to look at his stats to see it," Watters said during a recent Leaf practice.

Schneider "brings an abundance of offensive skills" to the team. "There's some feistiness about him and he's quick as anyone on the defence."

Besides, Watters pointed out, Schneider has Cup experience, having been a member of the Canadiens' Stanley Cup winning team in 1993.

Despite the glowing review, Schneider has also attracted his share of criticism. In Montreal, there were stories that he and goalie Patrick Roy didn't get along. Roy, apparently, was unhappy Schneider didn't play hurt during the Habs' '93 Cup run. (A knee injury limited Schneider to 11 games that playoff season.)

Watters dismisses those suggestions out of hand. "At best it's hocus pocus," he said. "At worst, it a terrible insult to a fine young man."

Mathieu Schneider

Since his acquisition, Schneider has done everything the coaches have asked of him. On some nights, he's been the best Leaf rearguard. On others, the third or fourth best, Watters added.

No doubt Schneider is still getting acclimatized to his Leafs teammates, but he clearly possesses the quickness and mobility so conspicuously absent from the rest of the Leafs rearguards.

Like many Canadian kids, Schneider grew up in a hockey environment. His mother came from a large French-Canadian family and his father, Sam, "thought all my cousins would be playing hockey, so he got me started young."

Mathieu attended Mount St. Charles Academy in Rhode Island for the hockey program and later transferred to Cornwall to play major junior hockey.

The five-foot-11, 189-pounder was the Habs's fourth choice, 44th overall in the 1987 entry draft.

He played some minor pro hockey in Sherbrooke before joining the Habs for good. His best season, statistically, was 1993-94 when he scored 20 goals and added 32 helpers in 70 games.

Last year, he was part of the late season purge that saw the Canadiens shuffle their lineup in a desparate bid to make the playoffs. He, Kirk Muller and Craig Darby were traded to New York for Pierre Turgeon and Vladimir Malakhov, but the move didn't help the Habs. They still didn't make the playoffs.

With the Leafs, he's a key figure in the team's bid for post-season play. Regardless of how the Leafs fare this season, Schneider said he's willing to sacrifice part of the summer to play on the American team at the upcoming World Cup (formerly the Canada Cup). The Hockey News has him rated among the best U.S. defencemen and a likely candidate to make the team.

Usually he hangs up his skates and spends most of his summer with his wife Yvonne, a native of Calgary whom he met on a blind date, and now, with their 13-month-old son, Jordan.

Back in Montreal during the lockout last season, Schneider participated in various philanthropic endeavors, helping raise money and equipment for the Israeli hockey program and dropping the puck at a Jewish hockey league game.

He's participated in charity golf tournaments and he organized a tournament of his own to benefit the Make a Wish Foundation. He also collaborated with ex-Habs winger John Leclair to organize a charity hockey game with proceeds going to a drug awareness program.

Although his stay in New York was a short one, he was invited by a Long Island Jewish community centre to help light a huge menorah last Chanukah, he said.

"I'm proud to be one of the few Jewish athletes in professional hockey. It's been a great reception for me wherever I've been."

Hockey, hoops marriage 'inevitable'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto's pro hockey and basketball clubs are destined to enter a marriage of convenience, Raptors' president John Bitove Jr. recently told an audience of basketball fans.

"I think it's inevitable when you're spending $200 million [for a new stadium]."

Bitove was the featured speaker at an evening with the Toronto Raptors sponsored by the Young Business Network and Young Construction Network of United Jewish Appeal.

In the last seven years, 20 new stadiums have been built in major North American cities because "the old buildings are economically obsolete," Bitove said.

The Maple Leafs need a new arena, and rather than spend millions, it would be economically advantageous for them to use the Air Canada Centre, the new $200-million basketball stadium soon to be built by the Raptors, he said.

"The two [clubs] can coexist. Philadelphia, Boston and New York [basketball and hockey clubs] all coexist under one roof," he said.

The Raptors' long-term goal is to win a championship, but that takes time, Bitove said. "You want to be the best, but you can't just expect it quickly. You have to try to nurture it like a little baby."

The team's average age of 24 is about four years younger than that on most NBA teams, he said. "In two or three years we'll be tough to mess with."

A lot of players want to play in Toronto. "The Blue Jays blazed the trail for American free agents," Bitove said.

The basketball team has already achieved one of its goals — "to become a success in the community," he said. "It far exceeded my dream ... The community has rallied around the team ... We're third in the league in attendance ... Success in the community means success for the organization."

Jonathan Brod, manager of concumer products for NBA Canada, told the meeting the league has grown in popularity since the United States launched the dream team in the 1992 Olympics.

As a result, there has been a rise in demand for licenced NBA merchandise. The Raptors are ranked fifth in the league just behind the Chicago Bulls in the sale of licenced products, Bitove noted.

"We get the kids hooked on merchandise at five, six and seven ... We see ourselves as the MacDonald's of professional sports."

Steven (E.T.) Spielberg...

With this issue,* The CJN *inaugurates Kids news, a monthly feature in which we hope to provide stories and features for children about modern-day role models and other entertaining delights.

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

When Steven Spielberg was young, he once woke up in the middle of the night in his home in Phoenix, Ariz. His father took him outside to watch a meteor shower and the boy gazed in awe at the beautiful points of light above him.

Spielberg was star struck. His desire to know more about the lights in the sky would one day lead him to make movies such as Close Encounters of the Third Kind and E.T.: The Extra Terrestrial.

As a child, he was afraid of many things — the tree outside his window, a stuffed toy clown or anything underneath his bed.

His family moved around a lot, because his father worked on some of the first computers.

Both these things made it hard for Spielberg to make friends and he spent a lot of time in his room with his pet parakeets and an imaginary friend from outer space.

He watched a lot of television, too, and loved Disney movies. So he was thrilled when his father gave him his own eight-millimetre camera.

When he was 12 years old, Spielberg began making movies. In his stories, he wasn't afraid any more. His imagination let him do anything or go anywhere.

Spielberg's first film lasted four minutes. He used his family and classmates in the movie. The class bully became his friend when Spielberg gave him the star role as a war hero.

His first long movie, Firelight, was about a scientist investigating lights in the sky. His father rented a real theatre to show the film and Spielberg sold tickets.

After that, his family moved from Phoenix to California. Spielberg first went to Universal Studios on a tour when he was 17. When he went back the next day, a guard mistook him for a famous director's son. He was then able to spend his whole summer around directors and writers.

Spielberg started university, but was more interested in making movies than in going to school.

He borrowed $10,000 from a friend and made a movie called Amblin. (Amblin later became the name of his film company.)

He got someone at Universal Studios to look at his film. They liked it so much they hired him. He left without finishing university and at age 21 he started working. It was his big chance.

Spielberg went on to produce and direct many wonderful, successful movies.

Jaws made more money in three months than any other movie before it. Jurassic Park cost $100 million to make and it earned over $500 million back!

But it wasn't all easy. Spielberg worked 20 hours a day.

He married actress Amy Irving and they have a son Max, but they were divorced in 1985.

He is now married to Kate Capshaw, who started in Temple of Doom, and they have a child.

As part of the Jewish community, Spielberg learned about the Holocaust as a teenager. His family invited their friends to sing songs around the piano and Spielberg noticed that several people had tattoos on their arms.

He learned that the Nazis had put those tattoos on the arms of Jewish men, women and children in the concentration camps.

That experience drove him to make the movie Schindler's List about a man who saved many Jews from death during World War II.

...is really down to earth

The story was so important to Spielberg that he used his own money to make the movie, which was a huge success.

It took five months to make the film in Poland, where Spielberg and the others experienced anti-Semitism during the filming.

Spielberg met survivors who shared their stories with him and he decided there was still something important he still had to do.

Pencil sketches by:
SIMON KIRSHENBLAT /96

He raised $12 million to videotape survivors of the Holocaust. Most of the work is done by volunteers and they have taped 10,000 people already. He plans to use the videos to teach children not to hate people because of their religion or color. He wants to tape survivors all around the world.

Spielberg loved the Disney character Jiminy Cricket, who said, "When you wish upon a star, makes no difference who you are. Anything your heart desires will come to you."

He says that as long as he cares about fairy dust and dreams, he will continue to make movies.

Assassin unrepentant as he receives life sentence

By RAINE MARCUS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV – An unrepentant Yigal Amir was convicted of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin by the Tel Aviv District Court last week.

Judges Edmond Levy, Oded Mudrich and Saviona Rotlevy handed down a life sentence for the murder, plus a consecutive six-year sentence for aggravated assault on Rabin's bodyguard Yoram Rubin, who was wounded in the shoulder by a bullet fired by Amir.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres said he hoped the punishment would deter other people from "making themselves into a high judge or God.

"The punishment pales in my eyes compared to the crime, although I have no recommendation on how to stiffen this punishment. In my eyes, this murder is a violation of all of our people's values from the Ten Commandments to the laws of the people and the state," he told Israel Radio.

Unlike at previous hearings, Amir did not smile in court, except for when his family entered and left the courtroom.

"I was forced to commit this deed," Amir said when Levy gave him a short time to make a statement. "The damage to the nation would have been worse if I hadn't done what I did. The Israeli people would have paid the price. I did what I did for God and the Israeli people. For three years I tried to do something to stop Rabin's path."

Before he was cut off by Levy for delivering a political speech, Amir criticized the court for failing to allow him to express his motives.

"God will help you," a stony-faced Amir told Levy following the verdict.

In convicting Amir, Levy stressed that the court had done everything possible to conduct a fair trial, especially since the defence had initially been conducted in a haphazard fashion. He also emphasized that it was the court which suggested thorough psychiatric evaluations, which showed that although there are narcissistic and schizoid elements in Amir's personality and he sees the world in "black and white," he not only understands the charges and is fit to stand trial, he also devised and planned the murder over a long period of time.

Levy also mentioned the consistent testimony of eyewitnesses, including General Security Service and police officers. Amir, he said, reiterated that under police interrogation, he had made all his statements of his own free will. He had freely admitted the murder to several police officers, said Levy, and his intent "to finish Rabin off."

Amir was calm and composed throughout the reading of the verdict.

After a short break, prosecutor Penina Guy and defence lawyer Shmuel Fleishman presented their arguments on sentencing.

Guy had requested life and a consecutive six-year sentence, emphasizing several times the mental damage caused to Rubin. Fleishman asked for the sentences to be served concurrently, arguing his client did not mean to wound Rubin.

He also argued that since the president is unlikely to commute his sentence, the sentences should be concurrent.

After a two-hour break, the judges pronounced sentence. Levy quoted poets Chaim Nachman Bialik, Lea Goldberg and Natan Yonatan, as well as the Torah.

Levy described the crime as the worst in Israeli history. Amir's arguments that he only intended to paralyze Rabin and stop the peace process were ridiculous, said Levy.

He told of his disgust when Amir not only failed to express regret for the murder, but also said he was prepared to pay the price.

"Anyone who commits such a murder, in cold blood and with calm and serenity, without remorse, does not deserve any compassion for losing all semblance of humanity," Levy said.

He also suggested that Israeli society and its educational system examine themselves for the decline in values which led to Amir's murderous act, ostensibly for ideological reasons, instead of expressing them verbally as may be done in a democracy.

Following sentencing, Amir cried, "This is a monster state." His lawyers said they may appeal to the Supreme Court after they study the verdict and sentence.

Conspiracy rejected

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Shamgar Commission Report categorically rejected the "conspiracy theories" surrounding the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, saying it had looked into many of them and found them baseless.

The report's discussion of General Security Service (GSS) informer Avishai Raviv, a central figure in many of those theories, is classified, a factor which is likely to keep many theorists guessing.

The published report only dealt indirectly and briefly with the use of informers by the GSS, in the final section outlining recommendations for improving the operations of the service. The recommendations appeared to reflect directly on the Raviv case.

"The body that operates an informer must keep tight control of him, not to allow him to initiate actions at his will ... and to prevent the carrying out of provocations, that in the end may have a boomerang effect," the report stated.

Many of the theories alleged that Raviv, who headed the Kach splinter group Eyal, goaded Amir into assassinating Rabin. Amir himself has denied this, and the GSS has downplayed Raviv's importance as an informer.

Turkey staves off Islamic government

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

On March 3, exactly a day before an Islamic Jihad suicide bomber detonated explosives that killed 13 people in the centre of Tel Aviv, Turkey's rival conservative political parties finally cobbled together a coalition government and thereby blocked the formation of an Islamic-based regime.

Apart from defusing a major crisis, the union of Mesmut Yilmaz's Motherland party and Tansu Ciller's True Path party came as a relief to Turkey's friends (including Israel) and to the vast majority of Turks who had cast their ballots for secular parties.

Turkey was plunged into a state of uncertainty when the Welfare party, which is dedicated to reshaping Turkey into an Islamic republic, attracted a plurality of the votes in last December's general election. The Islamists won 21.4 percent of the vote compared to slightly more than 19 percent each for the right-of-centre Motherland and True Path parties.

Turks committed to the principle of secularism gasped when President Suleyman Demirel asked Necmettin Erbakan, the Welfare party leader, to form what would have been Turkey's first Islamic government in more than 70 years.

When Erbakan — a 69-year-old German-trained engineer who claimed that his party was neither fundamentalist nor anti-Western — was unable to establish a government, Demirel turned to Yilmaz and Ciller (the outgoing prime minister). In the interests of keeping the Welfare party out of power, they set aside bitter personal feuds and signed an agreement, centred on a rotating premiership, that is supposed to last until the end of this century.

Turkey, a country of some strategic importance, should therefore enjoy a period of stability for the next few years. But with its plethora of economic and social problems still unresolved, Turkey remains vulnerable to the allure of the Welfare party, which has won an impressive number of local elections in recent years. Indeed, more than 400 towns and cities, notably Istanbul and Ankara, are controlled by mayors affiliated with Erbakan's party.

A land bridge between Europe and the Middle East, the modern state of Turkey emerged from the ruins of the Ottoman Empire in 1923. Its first and greatest president, Mustafa Kemal, or Ataturk as he was popularly known until his death in 1938, westernized and secularized Turkey, whose population of 60 million is almost entirely Muslim.

Ataturk disestablished Islam, abolishing the caliphate, closing Islamic schools, dissolving Sufi orders, banning the fez and replacing Islamic law and Arabic with a civil code and a Latin alphabet.

In a fundamental sense, Turkey was transformed. Yet, in much of the countryside, Islam still held sway. With the 1979 Islamic revolution in neighboring Iran, Islamic piety in Turkey grew, bolstered by the perception that corruption and incompetence were integral to Turkish governments on the municipal and national levels.

Like Hamas in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and Hezbollah in Lebanon, the Welfare party appealed to a disaffected electorate fed up with high unemployment and rampant inflation. The Welfare party exploited these grievances by sponsoring a network of educational and social welfare institutions and promising to alleviate poverty.

During the election campaign, Erbakan blamed Turkey's ailments on "world imperialism . . . Zionism, as well as Israel." Calling for closer relations with the Islamic world and a withdrawal from the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), Erbakan praised Iran's revolution. He also dined with Louis Farrakhan, the American Nation of Islam leader who was on a swing through the region.

Apart from alarming the Turkish elite, Erbakan's rhetoric triggered apprehension in Israel (and caused flutters of fear in the venerable Jewish community).

Having been burned by the new Islamic order in Iran, Israel was particularly worried that its vital relationship with Turkey — Israel's first with a Muslim nation — would be irretrievably jeopardized by an Erbakan government.

Israel and Turkey — which share an aversion to Islamic fundamentalist terrorism — have significantly upgraded their ties in the past two years.

In February 1994, Ezer Weizman was the first Israeli head of state to be invited to Turkey. Last month, his visit was reciprocated by Turkey's president, who signed four bilateral economic accords while in Jerusalem.

In November 1994, Ciller became the first Turkish prime minister to set foot on Israeli soil. Less than a year later, Israel Aircraft Industries received a five-year, $600 million contract to modernize Turkey's aging fleet of F-4 Phantom jets. Most recently, Israel and Turkey signed a military cooperation agreement.

Clearly, this is a golden moment in Israel-Turkish relations. But it could be shattered if Turks elect an Islamic government in the future.

The Week in Israel

March 25

• Yediot Aharonot reported that Israel's ambassador in Washington, Itamar Rabinovitch, stated, "Israel is ready to resume peace talks with Syria without any preconditions."

March 26

• Yediot Aharonot reported that Foreign Minister Ehud Barak will visit Tunis next month to participate in the opening of Israel's Tunisian Interest Office. The two countries' respective Interest Offices will be located initially inside the local Belgian embassies.

March 27

• Kol Yisrael reported that a subsidiary company of the Royal Jordanian Airlines will begin flights between Tel Aviv and Amman on April 7. The cost of a round-tip fare is $120 (US).

March 28

• The IDF's redeployment from Hebron, initially scheduled for this day, was postponed. No new date for the redeployment was announced, but Foreign Minister Ehud Barak said it would depend on the efforts by the Palestinian Authority to curb terrorism.

March 29

• Ha'aretz reported Israel is suggesting that relations with the United States be upgraded to the level of a strategic pact. "According to the Israeli proposal, Peres and Clinton will announce their intention to complete by September the agreement deepening strategic ties between Israel and the United States."

• The results of the Friday newspaper election polls:

Maariv/Gallup
For Prime Minister:
Peres – 48 percent; Netanyahu – 40; undecided – 12.
For Knesset:
Labor – 45 seats; Likud/Tsomet/Gesher – 39; Meretz – 6; NRP – 5; Shas – 4.

Yediot Aharonot/Dahaf
For Prime Minister:
Peres –51 percent; Netanyahu – 45; undecided – 4.
For Knesset:
Labor – 43 seats; Likud/Tsomet/Gesher – 43; Meretz – 7; NRP – 6; Shas – 4.

Judge expresses revulsion, disgust at Amir's crime

Following are excerpts from the sentence imposed by Judge Edmund A. Levy on Yigal Amir for the murder of Yitzhak Rabin:

The current indictment is one of the severest that has (ever) been submitted to an Israeli court. The decision to murder the prime minister, which was made with cold consideration and clear thinking, is not another "ordinary" crime which also must not be dealt with lightly – but was perpetrated, at least according to the accused's version, against a political background. Up until now, we innocently believed that this was the inheritance of others, not our inheritance.

We deeply regret that a man was killed, the leader of a nation and a people, who had borne the yoke of public service for many years, first as a soldier, and afterwards as a statesman. Many dangers lay in wait for him along the way, and he had succeeded in evading them all, until at the apex of his career, bullets – fired from an unexpected direction, not by a stranger or an enemy, but by one of our own – found him.

The heart grieves and the eye weeps, because we – as a people – also have taken a chilling slap on an exposed cheek when it became clear that criminal behavior had also reached our political life, as apparently ideological motives cut down the life of a man. And since history teaches that in any ideology which sanctifies murder as an end, murder (in its own right) becomes the entire ideology. And again we are confronted with proof that the decline in values among us has become a plague, even such that the importance and sanctity of life – which had been a lofty and indisputable value – is again, no longer as it was yesterday or the day before, even in those among us whose hearts have become unfeeling.

When thought was given to the possibility of an attempt being made on the life of an Israeli leader, we dismissed it as unlikely, since we innocently believed that in this area, we were not like other peoples. And suddenly, the illusion came to an end, and the picture of the late prime minister collapsing after the assassin's bullets had found him, has not disappeared from before our eyes. Those same bullets wounded the humanity of an entire nation and many millions who – for a long time – sought to believe that this was a nightmare and not reality, but who, every time they opened their eyes, again saw that awful horror. The time which has since passed has not lessened the great pain.

Every murder is an abominable act, but the act before us is sevenfold more abominable, because not only has the accused not expressed regret or sorrow, but he also seeks to show that he is at peace with himself over the act that he perpetrated. He who so calmly cuts short another's life, only proves the depth of wretchedness to which (his) values have fallen, and thus he does not merit any regard whatsoever, except pity, because he has lost his humanity.

The fact that such a wild growth could sprout from within our midst requires us to examine which parts of Israel's educational system failed in not successfully imparting and establishing the foundations of democracy into elements of the younger generation. The accused's actions are not only a personal failing, and it is not with him alone that we are coming to terms today. It is with everyone who, directly or indirectly, specifically or in general, gave him to understand that it was permissible to cut down a person's life on the basis of any ideology whatsoever.

The debate going on among us is difficult and pointed, because it deals with basic and existential issues for the State of Israel, not only for our generation, but mainly for future generations. We all agree on a common denominator – a genuine and sincere concern for the peace of the country on the one hand, and peace with our neighbors on the other.

As is customary in a democratic state, this discussion must be conducted firmly, yet with mutual respect and tolerance, with the latter being of particular importance especially when unpopular opinions are voiced by a minority. Furthermore, the split in the nation will neither disappear nor heal by words alone, but rather by deeds, first and foremost, the deeds of the public's leaders – from the entire political spectrum – who are commanded to teach themselves, day and night:

"Wise men, be careful of your words. Revenge is not a factor in rendering the sentence and, heaven forbid, that it should be a consideration in weighing the sentence. Therefore, when a court of law metes out its sentence, it must be calm and rational and remove anger from its heart lest a feeling of revenge cause it to stray from the right and just." (Rabbi Shlomo Ben-Aderet, 1235-1310)

However, when a court comes to render a verdict against a criminal who has committed such an unspeakable offence as is before us, it cannot ignore consideration of the suitability of the punishment to the offence. This is not an act of revenge, but rather an expression of revulsion and disgust against this crime which, due to its severity, undermines the very existence of civilized society.

THERE ARE LOTS OF RETIREMENT COMMUNITIES IN TAMPA. BUT ONLY ONE WITH ITS OWN JEWISH COMMUNITY CENTER.

If you're planning a visit to west Florida, we invite you to discover one of the area's most accommodating accommodations — Weinberg Village.

Here, on a lush 21-acre campus (just 15 minutes from Tampa International Airport), you'll find a beautiful new senior community that offers the added convenience of assistance with activities of daily living, along with housekeeping, laundry services and scheduled transportation — all on a monthly rental basis.

You'll also find a distinctly Jewish environment that offers three kosher meals each day. Because our campus is home to Tampa's Jewish Community Center, Weinberg Village residents can also enjoy a heated pool, fitness center, walking trails, and a host of intergenerational activities.

We invite you to see it for yourself. You'll find that Weinberg Village offers you an exceptionally welcoming place to live, — along with a climate that's warm and inviting, in more ways than one.

Hezbollah Kaytushas rain down on the Galilee

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Residents of towns and villages along the northern border emerged last Sunday morning from bomb shelters and security rooms, where they had spent the night, following three salvoes of Hezbollah Katyusha rocket attacks on the Galilee late Saturday night.

There were no serious casualties. Only one resident of Kiryat Shmona was very lightly hurt, and she did not require hospitalization.

Hezbollah warned Sunday the Katyusha attacks were not its final word in retaliation for the killing of two Lebanese civilians by IDF shelling earlier that day.

Hezbollah's fighting arm, the Islamic Resistance, said the 28 rockets fired in three salvoes at western and central Galilee and the Panhandle were only a taste of reprisals to come.

The Resistance, in a statement broadcast on Lebanese radio, said it reserves the right to retaliate in its own time and manner, and warned the "Zionist enemy not to carry out any stupid acts."

Several apartments in the town were damaged by a Katyusha which glanced off the roof of the building and exploded on the ground.

Windows in several of the apartments in the three-story building were shattered. Amidar, the government housing company, decided to provide alternative accommodation for a woman whose home was badly damaged.

Rafi Even-Tzur has lived in Kiryat Shmona for 41 of his 50 years and has no desire to live anywhere else. Like the rest of the town's 20,000 residents, however, he says he would like some "peace and quiet and the opportunity to lead a normal life for ourselves and our families.

"I'm not talking for myself so much as for the children who feel the strain more and also suffer more emotionally. This kind of situation is not good for anybody, especially not for them.

"The alert is sounded. You wait and then you hear the rockets, but you don't know where they are going to fall, on what address."

Even-Tzur, who works at Kiryat Shmona's fledgling airport, said that life in the town came to a standstill from the time the alert was sounded on Saturday evening.

Residents in all towns and villages along the border were told to stay in shelters and security rooms.

"We had intended to go out and do some shopping for Pesach. Instead, we were stuck at home, and everything was closed, the shops, the cafes, businesses, factories, and the airport," Even-Tzur said.

A tense quiet prevailed along the northern border and in south Lebanon Sunday following the attacks and IDF shelling of suspected terrorist targets north of the zone.

Reports from Lebanon said Israel Air Force (IAF) warplanes staged mock bombing raids Sunday, especially in the south.

President Ezer Weizman visited Kiryat Shmona Sunday afternoon and later met with Western Galilee council heads in Nahariya. In both places he heard criticism about what was described as the lack of a harsh response to Hezbollah and complaints that the government is not doing enough to help the region in view of the security situation.

At the conclusion of his visit to Kiryat Shmona, Weizman said the situation in south Lebanon could not continue in its present form. He called on residents to be patient and let the IDF handle the matter.

"When, where, and how is not for us to discuss today. I can only tell you that I predict – that I know – that the matter will be dealt with," Weizman told residents.

Hezbollah's Katyusha attacks followed an incident Saturday afternoon, when IDF troops spotted what they thought was an armed gang moving on the outskirts of Yatar village, north of the security zone, and opened fire at them, killing two and wounding at least one other. It later became known that they were residents of Yatar who for the past two weeks had been building a water tank in the village.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres subsequently admitted they had been killed by mistake and said Israel regretted the incident. This message was relayed to the United States, reportedly with a warning that Israel would respond harshly if Hezbollah retaliated as it has in the past with Katyusha attacks on the Galilee.

The message was then passed on to the Syrians with an urgent request to them to curb Hezbollah and prevent an escalation, but Hezbollah responded with the three Katyusha salvoes.

371 Palestinians arrested

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Israeli security forces rounded up 371 Palestinians in villages north of Ramallah last week for questioning about suspected links with Islamic militants.

The pre-dawn sweep was the largest since the IDF began to share control over most Arab villages in Judea and Samaria with the Palestinian Police. The army said it was aimed at netting suspected terrorists and students from the Gaza Strip, whose presence in the West Bank was declared illegal following the recent suicide bombings.

The arrests nearly doubled the number of Palestinians Israeli forces have taken in since the beginning of the month.

The raids were the last action under the command of Maj.-Gen. Ilan Biran, who is ending his two-year stint as OC Central Command and retiring from military service.

"The war against terror is not measured in quantity, but the quality of intelligence and getting the perpetrator, capturing him and interrogating him," Biran told reporters.

Under cover of darkness, security forces, including paratroopers, undercover units and policemen, swept through the town of Bir Zeit and the villages of Abu Kash and Shakheida, banging on doors and hauling suspects outside. They were taken to large compounds erected on the football field in Bir Zeit.

The main goal of the operation was to round up Gazans studying in colleges in the Ramallah area in defiance of Biran's order to return home.

Biran said they targeted the Gazans because most of the Hamas activists linked to the bombers were students from Gaza, many of whom attend Bir Zeit University.

Since the IDF had coordinated the operation with the Palestinians, the Palestinian Police did not try to interfere. Military sources said the IDF waited until the last moment to notify the Palestinians, in order to keep the raid a secret.

Jewish assets said greater than Swiss bankers admit

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – The value of Jewish assets held in Swiss bank accounts since World War II appears to far exceed what Swiss bankers have acknowledged, according to declassified U.S. military documents.

The first of thousands of pages of the documents recently unearthed at the National Archives record assets held in 182 accounts in one Swiss Bank, Société Général de Surveillance, SA, in Geneva.

Adjusting for inflation, the Congressional Research Service has determined that the assets in the one bank total $29 million (US), said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJA), which provided the documents to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

The WJC and the Jewish Agency for Israel are waging a campaign to reclaim assets lost by Jews in Europe during and after World War II.

Dated July 12, 1945, the documents list names and assets of account-holders from nine countries: Romania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Croatia, Moravia, Slovakia, France, Holland and Denmark, and the breakdown of assets by currency.

The funds are "owned principally by Jewish persons," the documents state.

Wishing all of our clients and friends a happy Passover.

Election notebook

Meretz Party's Primary

JERUSALEM – Knesset incumbents won the top 10 spots in the Meretz bloc's primaries.

The results of the voting were released March 25, a day after Meretz members went to the polls to choose their list of candidates for the Knesset elections.

Meimad Opts Out of Elections

JERUSALEM – The Meimad executive recently ended months of speculation, deliberation and negotiation and decided not to run in the Knesset elections.

Meimad spokesperson Yisrael Cohen said the executive voted overwhelmingly both against running as a separate list, and against running with another party.

One Meimad official said the decision not to run was made after the executive realized the party would not get enough votes for one Knesset seat. Meimad head Rabbi Yehuda Amital said weeks ago that he was opposed to Meimad running separately, and favored some kind of merger with the NRP.

Meimad has already called on its supporters to vote for Shimon Peres.

Netanyahu: Vote For Party Leadership

JERUSALEM – Likud chair Benjamin Netanyahu recently exhorted party members to vote for "the entire Likud leadership and ignore all deals and preferred lists" in the March 26 primaries.

Netanyahu thereby unequivocally dissociated himself from lists said to be circulating in the party branches from which various key figures are conspicuously absent. On one such list, MKs Dan Meridor and Ariel Sharon were not included; on another MK Ze'ev Benjamin Begin.

Labor's Knesset Slate

JERUSALEM – Sixteen new faces appear on Labor's list for the next Knesset, which was presented after the national and regional lists elected in recent primaries were combined.

Senior Labor figures expressed satisfaction with the young new leadership concentrated at the top of the list, including Ehud Barak (slot three in the final list), Benjamin Ben-Eliezer (slot four), Ephraim Sneh (eight), and Ori Orr (10).

Tourism Minister Uzi Baram, who shot ahead of previous poll favorites Barak and Haim Ramon (slot five) to reach first place in the primaries, said he would consider running for prime minister in the future.

Labor Secretary-General Nissim Zvilli (seven), who presented the list, noted it includes six women, three of them first-time Knesset candidates; six candidates under age 40; and 19 candidates of Sephardi origin.

TV: Begin, Meridor Top Likud List

JERUSALEM – Whatever deals were rumored to have been hatched in the Likud, they did not keep MKs Ze'ev Begin and Dan Meridor from the top slots in the recent primaries, according to projections by TV pollsters on both Channel 1 and Channel 2. Right next to them is Ariel Sharon, who masterminded the joint ticket with Tsomet and Gesher, and the most lustrous Likud acquisition of the season, Maj.-Gen.(res.)Yitzha Mordechai. The projections were welcomed by Likud chair Benjamin Netanyahu, who congratulated his party on choosing an excellent team — which was immediately derided by Labor.

Labor's Machine Well Oiled

JERUSALEM – The Labor party machine is alive and well. The results of the Labor vote illustrate better than anything the continuing power of the backstage manipulators.

The list produced in the Labor primaries is one which would have gladdened the heart of any Labor appointments committee of yesteryear.

Prime Minister Shimon Peres has every reason to feel gratified. He would not have put a different list together himself.

The dark horse appearance of Tourism Minister Uzi Baram in the second slot is just the sort of thing Peres himself did in the past with such candidates as Shoshana Arbelli-Almoslino. Like her, Baram is no real challenge to Peres and no leading contender to succeed him.

He is harmless, non-threatening and comfortable to have around. In the great prestige battle between Foreign Minister Ehud Barak and Interior Minister Haim Ramon, Peres was known to have unequivocally backed Barak.

Yom Ha'atzmaut Teen Cartoon Festival

We are asking all teenagers to turn on their creative juices and submit to us cartoons dealing with the subject of Israel. In particular, we are looking for cartoons which have both artistic and intellectual merit. They may be funny, serious, satiric or cute. We are looking for cartoons which poignantly and tastefully convey one of the many truths about life in Israel.

Who can enter: All teenagers are eligible except the children of CJN employees.

How to enter: You may submit as many entries as you like.

The judges will choose cartoons which are well-illustrated, clever and tasteful.

Six cartoons will be selected as winners: three cartoons from contestants 15 years of age and younger, and three cartoons from contestants 16 to 19 years of age inclusive.

The cartoons must be drawn in black and white. This will ensure that the cartoon reproduces as well as possible.

Please write your name, age, address and phone number on the back of your submission.

You may mail or deliver your submission to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ont., M3C 3A1. If you want us to return the cartoon, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on April 15, 1996.

Prizes: The "winning" cartoons will be published in The CJN Yom Ha'atzmaut issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a $50.00 cheque.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only six will be chosen for publication. The judges' decisions will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: The contestants whose cartoons are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, April 19, 1996.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning submissions will be published in The CJN of April 25, 1996.

We hope the contest generates original, witty, imaginative and possibly even inspiring thought. We look forward to receiving your entries.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Likud outlines security stance

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – If Likud wins the election, it will take measures that will impinge upon Palestinian control of the territories without prior consultation, including strengthening settlements and launching pre-emptive raids into Palestinian cities to root out terrorists, MK Ariel Sharon is reported to have told a Western diplomat recently.

Another diplomat warned that if Sharon's plan is adopted, it would have dire consequences, bringing about the "downfall of the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the collapse of the Israeli-Palestinian peace track."

Sharon's reported remarks are being taken seriously because of his strong second place finish in the Likud primaries last week.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu has said that "security will remain in Israeli hands," and that Israel will "maintain the freedom of action" to go anywhere for this purpose. However, Netanyahu has, for the most part, avoided specifics, and Sharon's statements mark the first known Likud elaboration of its security principles.

When contacted for a response last night, an aide to Netanyahu said all the principles enumerated by Sharon "sound right, including strengthening settlements."

He also noted that regardless of military actions, "neither Netanyahu nor Sharon want to reconquer Jenin, Nablus or Gaza. We are dedicated not just to fighting terrorism, but also pursuing peace."

Sharon reportedly told the foreign diplomat that the Likud would be guided by the following principles:

A Likud government would set up two parallel "security belts" in the territories – running parallel along the Jordan River and along the West Bank side of the Green Line – which would both be run by Israel.

It remained unclear how the unilateral establishment of such security zones would impact upon some existing designated rural areas, known as Area B under the Oslo accords, where the Palestinians are supposed to have some control.

In the past, Sharon has been the champion of the "cantons plan," which favors IDF control over islands of Palestinian autonomous areas centred in the Palestinian cities.

The IDF under Likud will feel free to stage pre-emptive raids into Palestinian cities (Area A) to root out terrorists, without prior consultation with the PA. In contrast, the Peres government has studiously avoided raids into the cities, instead focusing on Area B and the other 70 percent of the West Bank, Area C, which remains under Israeli control.

If Palestinians continue to refuse to extradite suspects, Israel will reserve the right to take them itself, using force, Sharon reportedly said, and all Palestinian institutions in Jerusalem will be closed. In contrast, Peres pledged to the late Norwegian foreign minister Johan Jorgen Holst that non-PA institutions could remain open.

Healing the rift among Jews

By MARTIN S. KROSSEL
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — It's a long way from Toronto's Bathurst Street to Broad Street in the Fleetwood section of Mount Vernon, a community just north of New York City.

But Lisa Schwartz of Toronto has adapted happily to marriage, motherhood and a new home.

Her husband, Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, is the spiritual leader of the Fleetwood Synagogue, an Orthodox congregation with a membership of some 100 families.

And last summer, she gave birth to twins.

Rabbi Steinmetz credits his wife for organizing Parents, Children and the Holidays, a program run four times a year before major holidays. These informal workshops are designed to have adults and youngsters have fun and learn together.

The children's program is especially important for the synagogue, since it attracts participants that are not affiliated with the shul and outreach is a high priority for the Fleetwood congregation.

Rabbi Steinmetz, a native of Monsey, N.Y., and a Yeshiva University graduate, emphasizes the openness of his synagogue. He says that all are welcome regardless of their levels of Jewish knowledge or observance. This tolerance is also reflected in his community involvement. He has often participated in forums and panels with rabbis from other branches of Judaism.

Frequently the topics are controversial. For instance, he was once asked to present the Orthodox position on patrilineal descent, the notion that the child can be considered Jewish if the father is Jewish and the mother is not.

Most recently, Rabbi Steinmetz has been concerned by the divisiveness in the Jewish Community engendered by the Arab-Israeli peace process. Nearly a month before the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, he launched a drive to have both supporters and opponents of the peace process sign a pledge committing themselves to ahavat Yisrael.

The document reads: "I affirm that ahavat Yisrael, the love of my fellow Jews, takes precedence over my opinion of the peace process. I in no way relinquish my right to debate the peace process openly and actively. However, as I express my opinion, my words and actions will reflect my love of other Jews. I realize that even though I will disagree with other Jews, it is the disagreement of love, a disagreement of brother and sisters."

The Westchester Board of Rabbis has endorsed the document and included it in a mailing to all of the rabbis in the country. The Westchester Jewish Conference has also endorsed the statement.

Rabbi Stephen Klein, the president of the Board of Rabbis and the spiritual leader of a Reform congregation in Scarsdale, says, "Doing this shows the unity that's possible between Reform, Conservative and Orthodox rabbis and lay leaders."

Schwartz' father has shown the statement to his rabbi, Wayne Allen, of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Congregation, in the hope that it will soon be distributed throughout the congregation.

"I don't know if I can supply all the steps that are necessary to heal the rift in Klal Yisrael," Rabbi Steinmetz, " but at least I can suggest one step that might help."

Martin S. Krossel, a former Torontonian, is a writer who now lives in New Jersey.

Helicopter crashes

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – An Israel Air Force Yasur 2000 transport helicopter crashed during a training mission in the Judean Desert last Sunday, plummeting from less than 100 feet and killing seven of the nine people aboard.

OC Air Force Maj.-Gen. Herzl Bodinger said it was too early to tell if the accident was a result of a technical malfunction or human error and ordered an investigation.

Israel's Prime Minister and Defence Minister Shimon Peres expressed sorrow at the loss of life and sent condolences to the bereaved.

It was the first crash in six years involving a Yasur, an upgraded U.S.-made Sikorsky CH-53, considered a relatively sturdy craft.

The helicopter was taking part in a routine exercise dropping off soldiers and had just put down a squad and taken off when it apparently lost power and crashed, burst into flames and was destroyed.

The pilot, Maj. Eyal Gelb, 32, of Ramat Gan; co-pilot, Capt. Ofer Schwartz, 25, of Rishon Lezion; flight technician, St.-Sgt.-Maj. David Weizman, 40; and three soldiers – Cpl. Guy Shafir, 20, of Kiryat Ono; Cpl. Liat Fildo, 20, of Karmiel; and Cpl. Doron Ezra, 20, of Rishon Lezion – were killed instantly, Bodinger said.

Cpl. Inbal Tavisi, 20, of Petach Tikva, who was apparently videotaping the exercise, died of her injuries in the hospital, he said.

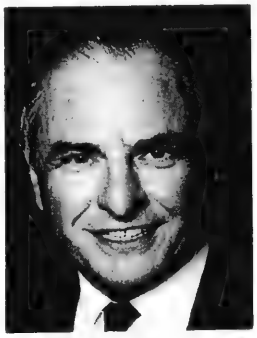
Firm teaches skills in dynamic presentation

Enthusiasm, persuasiveness and energy are key components

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN



Myer Levine

TORONTO — Myer Levine was one of the many people who could not speak in public — not even at his own wedding.

Over the years, he has worked hard to overcome his fear of speaking in public. In the process, he took the Dale Carnegie course and has been a Dale Carnegie instructor for more than 25 years.

After 36 years, he left his corporate/commercial law practice to establish a new business venture, Dynamic Presentations Inc., which trains individuals and small groups in the skills needed for effective communication.

"Today, the economy has shrunk, competition is keen and global, and everyone is in the communications business," says Levine. "More than at any other time, being able to present effectively has taken on more importance."

The business world has changed, he says. In the past, in many businesses, the senior staff did the contact and created the networking for the firm. "Now, with greater competition and as more seniors are retiring, it is important for everyone to attract new business, juniors as well as those who are highly technical. They are called upon to talk about products or services and they can no longer make dull, boring presentations.

"The old loyalties are gone. Companies go shopping for quotes and often the winning bid is based on impressions that the presentation leaves, not so much the content, which is often similar. What comes across is enthusiasm, persuasiveness and energy, whether it is for business, personal, voluntary or social endeavors."

Research, he says, has shown that 55 percent of an effective talk is in the body language — dress, facial expression, confidence and animation. The use of voice is credited for 38 percent — how one changes pitch, pauses and modulates the voice. Only 7 percent of the effectiveness of the speech is attributed to the content.

"Fear of presenting is holding many people back," Levine says.

To overcome fear and enhance one's speaking ability, he says he prefers to work one-on-one, as this provides confidentiality and he is able to focus on the individual needs of the client.

But his wife, Sybil, who has worked as an executive officer in the corporate world, joined Dynamic Presentations as a coach/trainer and does work with small groups.

All sessions begin with personal interviews, an assessment and coaching, which includes videotaping presentations and reviewing them with the client.

"When people are more at ease in making presentations, they gain an inner self confidence. They see themselves in a more positive way and are able to relate in a more meaningful and satisfying way with others," he says.

The Levines have had a positive response from individuals, firms and companies. "Our instincts have proven to be right," says Levine. "There is a huge need and want for these skills — for individuals who have to market their ideas, products and services, and for people who serve on boards and committees but are afraid to speak up or accept greater responsibility."

Uncanny resemblance to Seinfeld opens doors for aspiring actor

By CINDY WAXER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At Howard and Carole Tanenbaum's Passover seder, the most commonly asked question isn't "Why is this night different from all other nights?" Rather, it's "What makes our son Dan different from Jerry Seinfeld?"

Dan Tanenbaum, 24, is an art director and copy writer from Toronto who bears a startling resemblance to the NBC sitcom star.

Tanenbaum's career as a celebrity look-alike began when he was spotted in a Toronto bar by an aspiring writer whose story about the similarity was published in People magazine.

Since then, Tanenbaum has made television appearances on Inside Edition, The Dini Petty Show, Extra, Camille Scott and CBC Evening News. He has performed at the Golden Globe Awards in Los Angeles. The Ron Smith celebrity look-alike agency has predicted he could make $50,000 to $100,000 (US) working part time; and the William Morris agency is currently negotiating a deal with Seinfeld's people that will see Tanenbaum in a future Thursday night episode.

But years before his rise to celebrity status, Tanenbaum was honing his skills as a comedian before a tough audience: his family. "Friday night dinners were my open-mike nights," Tanenbaum says.

After the days of Shabbat shtick and working the bar mitzvah circuit as a magician, Tanenbaum went to university, where he wrote comedy for a televised college sitcom while earning a degree in advertising.

Currently, Tanenbaum is residing in Los Angeles, pursuing his dream of becoming an actor/comedian by capitalizing on his resemblance to Seinfeld. In Los Angeles, the production crew of Extra had Tanenbaum drive up to the gates of the Seinfeld studios and tell the guard he had lost his access card. Without a second glance, the guard ushered him in.

But Tanenbaum is currently researching some 12,000 celebrity-agencies to find the one that will help him to develop his own skills and popularity as a performer. Between lunch dates, he participates in celebrity look-alike events.

Even Seinfeld himself, upon meeting Tanenbaum in Detroit's Fox Theatre, coldly agreed: "Yah, I guess he kinda looks like me."

Tanenbaum continues to schlep his way to becoming a star in his own right. Punctuating his words with rapid gestures that could only be Seinfeld's, he says, "One day I'd love someone to finally say 'Hey, aren't you Dan Tanenbaum?'" Maybe next year in Jerusalem.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Shtetl*, the Documentary: Born nearly 60 years ago in Warsaw, Chicago-based documentary filmmaker Marian Marzynski has returned to Poland eight times in recent years. While there, he has shot more than 70 hours of tape in and around the village of Bransk, whose wartime population of about 2,500 Jews mostly died in the gas chambers of Treblinka.

Besides focusing on a young Polish Catholic engaged in retrieving Jewish artifacts from the town's past, Marzynski filmed a 70-year-old Chicago Jew, Nathan Kaplan, who comes to Bransk in search of the house in which he was born.

Raised as a 'hidden child'

His camera confronts Polish partisans, Poles who hid Jews in their barns, Poles who allegedly turned Jews over to the Nazi authorities, and many townsfolk who speak openly of atrocities they witnessed half a century before.

The result is Shtetl, a three-hour documentary that is due to be aired in its entirety on the American PBS network (including WNED-TV in Buffalo) on April 17 at 8 p.m. and again on April 18 at noon. Many astonishing stories are told in the course of this rivetting documentary, including Marzynski's own. He was raised in a Catholic orphanage as a "hidden child" after his parents passed him out of the Warsaw ghetto.

A Story of Survival: Playwright-performer Susan Miller brings her critically acclaimed production My Left Breast to Toronto for three performances only in April, in support of the Alliance of Breast Cancer Survivors.

My Left Breast is about the loss of a breast through cancer. It is also about the loss of love, the loss of a sense of security, the loss of children who grow up and leave home, the loss of a partner, the loss of self-image and the loss of definition when traditional definitions no longer fit.

Based in New York City, Susan Miller is a breast cancer survivor. She describes herself as "a one-breasted, menopausal, Jewish, bisexual lesbian Mom." Her most recent play, My Left Breast won an Obie award, as did several earlier plays. She has also written short stories and episodes of Thirtysomething and L.A. Law for television. Last fall, she organized 20 women to portage canoes through the streets of downtown Toronto to raise money for the Alliance of Breast Cancer Survivors.

April 19 and 20 at 8 p.m., April 21 at 2.30 p.m., at Tallulah's Cabaret, 12 Alexander St., Toronto. 416-975-8555.

British beef banned

By JENNIFER FRIEDLIN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Both Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) last Tuesday announced a ban on imports of British beef, after the U.K. government's disclosure last week that 10 people who contracted an incurable brain wasting disease probably got it from eating tainted British beef.

Israel imports frozen meat from 12 nations, two of which have reported incidences of bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE), known as mad cow disease, which is thought to be transferred to humans in the form of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease.

France and Ireland have reported isolated cases of BSE, compared to 15,000 cases per year in the U.K.

According to guidelines set by Israel's Veterinarians Association, frozen cattle livers, bones, hearts and tongues should not be imported.

The PA released an anxiety-quelling message, saying it intends to carefully inspect all meat imports.

In 1989, Britain banned the use of sheep organs, cattle brains and other animal parts in the meat processing industry after studies showed that the parts contained BSE.

Britain has said that the spread of Creutzfeldt-Jakob is unlikely because of the measures taken since 1989.

Israel and the PA are among more than 20 countries who have banned imports of British beef.

Film memoir captures Kosinski's ambiguity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Jerzy Kosinski, the celebrated American novelist, committed suicide in 1991, suffocating himself by pulling a plastic bag over his head. The motive will always elude us, just as the true self of this human chameleon will always lie beyond our grasp.

Jack Kuper, in his film memoir of this extraordinarily complex and strange man (Who Was Jerzy Kosinski?), reaches no definitive conclusions with regard to this question. But Kuper's 52-minute documentary, to be screened on Vision TV on April 9 at 8 p.m., is never less than intriguing.

Kuper and Kosinski, both Polish Jews, were contemporaries who seem to have had parallel experiences during the Holocaust. Later, they enshrined them in best-selling books published in the same year, Child of the Holocaust and The Painted Bird.

In the late 1960s, Kuper — a Torontonian — found himself in Manhattan, and phoned Kosinski. Although Kuper was a total stranger, Kosinski invited him to his home, treating him like a long-lost brother. From this unlikely encounter emerged a sporadic but fascinating friendship, which Kosinski eventually severed.

Based on an article Kuper wrote for Toronto Life, a monthly magazine, Who Was Jerzy Kosinski? unfolds through the medium of pungent reminiscences by Kuper and others who had the fortune of knowing this gifted, multi-layered individual.

On the basis of their judgments, Kosinski comes across as moody, paranoic, egotistical, wordly and brilliant.

But, of course, there is much more to the story. Obsessed by sex and success, Kosinski was plagued by a profound identity crisis. In The Painted Bird, a classic of Holocaust literature, he left the impression that he was a gypsy. When Kuper asked him to clarify the matter, Kosinski was deliberately vague, claiming he was Jewish and his parents were Christians.

So what was Kosinski? According to one wag, he was "a Jew pretending to be a Christian pretending to be a Jew."

Fervid imagination

Kuper raises further troubling issues. Is The Painted Bird composed of fragments from Kosinski's turbulent life, or is it a figment of his fervid imagination? The answer may surprise you.

More ominously, Kuper revisits a controversy which turns on accusations that Kosinski was a plagiarist.

Kuper suggests, somewhat delicately, that the soft-cover edition of The Painted Bird contains a passage brazenly lifted from Child of the Holocaust.

And a photograph of Kosinski and his mother, which appeared in New York magazine after his untimely death, was really that of Kuper and his mother.

Regrettably, then, Kosinski was a plagiarist and an imposter. But he was also an amazing person who was constantly reinventing himself — a work in progress, if you will. Kuper's film successfully encapsulates the ambiguity which defined him from beginning to end.

Interest rates remain stable

JERUSALEM – Interest rates this month will remain at their current level, the Bank of Israel said in its announcement of the monetary program for April.

The central bank's short-term rate was set at 14 percent last month, when it was raised by 30 basis points.

The decision follows two higher-than-expected monthly climbs in the Cost of Living Index, each by 90 basis points, which led some analysts to expect another tightening move by Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel.

The bank said the economic impact of the closure on traffic between Israel and territories controlled by the Palestinian Authority has yet to express itself in the macro-economic indicators.

Business Profile

Yael Varsano-Barzilay

Economic consul bullish on business in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The desk in Yael Varsano-Barzilay's downtown office is covered with 10 neatly stacked piles of paper — files in progress and material to be read — that hint at the vast scope of her position as Israel's economic consul to Canada.

Despite recent crises in Israel — the November assassination of Yitzhak Rabin and a spate of deadly suicide bombings — Varsano-Barzilay is optimistic about Israel's economic future. In fact, she appears as calm and confident as her orderly desk would suggest.

"Israel has certainly taken a beating," she concedes. "But it seems that the strength of the Israeli economy is very evident. Investors coming from outside have not lost faith."

The post-bombing performance of the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) lends credence to her words. Despite feared drops of five to 10 percent, the TASE was only one percent lower when trading resumed March 6 after a day off for Purim, according to a recent Jersalem Telegraphic Agency report.

"We had seven years of intifada. The economy is doing wonderfully," said Varsano-Barzilay. Not one person has called her to express second thoughts about doing business with Israel.

"Anyone looking into Israel in the long term will find it very beneficial," she added, offering back-up statistics:

- Israel's economy has grown on average 5.8 percent over the last five years.
- Its 1995 GDP was $86 billion (US).
- Its GDP grew at an annual rate of seven percent in 1995.
- Its unemployment rate is down to 6.8 percent, despite an influx of new immigrants.
- In 1984, inflation topped 400 percent, but by 1995 it was down to 8.2 percent.

Varsano-Barzilay has had an excellent vantage point from which to examine recent changes in the Israeli economy, despite her relative youth.

At 32, she is the first woman to hold her position in North America. Two other Israeli women serve as trade commissioners out of about 30 worldwide, a trend that is on the upswing.

A graduate of Tel Aviv University's Business School with a master of science degree in organizational behavior, Varsano-Barzilay has been with Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade since 1991. Before she arrived in Toronto last September, she was based in Jerusalem as deputy director of the North American division, Foreign Trade Administration. She was part of the Israeli team of negotiators working on the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement.

Yael Varsano-Barzilay, 32, is the first woman economic counsel in North America. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

A native of Petach Tikvah, Varsano-Barzilay speaks English with only a hint of an accent. As a teenager, she moved to Switzerland for four years with her family and attended an American school.

Before taking her first government position, Varsano-Barzilay worked in the private sector as a marketing manager for Ynon Technologies Ltd. in Ramat Gan.

The hi-tech industry in which she got her early experience is Israel's fastest growing business sector, she said.

The Israeli work force is very educated (with 135 scientists and technicians per 10,000 workers, more than three times the ratio in Canada), she pointed out.

In addition, the size of the country can be a factor.

"Sometimes in Canada you have small pockets of knowledgeable people. It's a very big country and it can be difficult to collect a high-end technological team. Manpower is more accessible in Israel. Tel Aviv, Ramat Gan, even Haifa are not that far from each other. You would find a lot of people willing to live in Haifa and meet halfway in a plant located in, say, Netanya. It's very manageable."

In the six months she has been here, Varsano-Barzilay has found that Canadians and Israelis know too little about each other from a business standpoint.

She encourages businesspeople to think of Israel not only as a market of 5.5 million people, but as a gateway to the Middle East and Europe.

"The way to survive in Israel as a hi-tech company is not to rely on the local market, which is relatively small, but from day one to start thinking about export."

When it comes to trade between Israel and Canada, there has been steady growth, but the rate is low compared to the potential, she notes.

She expects that will begin to change when the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (FTA) is implemented.

In 1995, Israel exported $170 million (Cdn) worth of goods to Canada, with diamonds at the top of the list. Canada, in turn, exported $257 million (Cdn) to Israel, a 26 percent increase over the previous year. Machinery, including electronics, was the most significant export (25 percent), then base metals, paper and paper products, and wood and wood products.

Varsano-Barzilay is hopeful that the FTA will be finalized later this year, pending approval of both governments.

When that happens, tariffs on most incoming merchandise will be immediately reduced to zero, she explained.

In recent years, Canada has been at a disadvantage when it comes to exporting to Israel. In the early 1990s, Sweden and the United States were able to sell prefabricated housing to Israel for its new olim at a more competitive price, because Israel has trade agreements with both the United States and the European Union.

About 80 percent of Canadian trade currently goes to the United States, Varsano-Barzilay says. That leaves only about 20 percent for other countries.

In recent years, municipal authorities in Israel have begun to encourage foreign investors thinking of opening a plant in Israel, she says.

Varsano-Barzilay's office can supply information about concerns such as the cost of office space in Israel and the availability of government incentives for foreign investors. In some cases, the Israeli government will fund up to 34 percent of the cost of the investment, as a grant.

"I think it makes it very enticing, although of course, that's not the only reason to invest in Israel."

Another benefit of Israel is its proximity to Europe and its FTA with the European Union, she points out.

Israel is the only country in the world to have duty-free FTAs with both the European Union and the United States, she notes. In addition to wrapping up the FTA with Canada, Israel also has negotiations under way with the Czech republic, Hungary and Poland. Negotiations with Turkey were completed last month.

"It makes Israel a very interesting base," Varsano-Barzilay concludes.

Shaare Zedek to honor Bregmans

TORONTO — Lou and Yetta Bregman are being honored by The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation with the creation of a fund in their name for the neonatology intensive care unit of Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Centre.

"As Shaare Zedek supporters of long standing and as leaders in the city's business and cultural communities, Lou and Yetta are very deserving of this tribute," said Bernard Abrahms, national president of the foundation.

Proceeds from the tribute will be used to purchase neonatal intensive care stations at Shaare Zedek for the treatment of seriously ill newborns. Each station consists of a technologically advanced warmer/incubator, a multi-faceted monitoring system, a respirator, an oxymeter and four electronic pumps.

At a launch reception held in the offices of First Marathon Securities, Prof. Jonathan Halevy, director general of Shaare Zedek, said more than 6,000 babies are born there annually — more than twice the number of any other hospital in Greater Jerusalem.

Shaare Zedek has become the medical centre of choice for high-risk prenatal care and deliveries, he said. Many high-risk pregnant women suffer from such ailments as diabetes or high blood pressure. Patients are also referred to Shaare Zedek from other hospitals in Israel and elsewhere in the Middle East.

Integrated women's unit

High-risk babies are often born prematurely and/or with serious problems requiring the specialized treatment provided by the unit. Upwards of 550 infants are cared for annually there, sometimes at a cost of $1,000 (US) per day per baby for several weeks or months.

Shaare Zedek is currently building an integrated women's and infant centre that will incorporate maternity, neonatology, gynecology, gynecological oncology and in-vitro fertilization.

There will be twice as many maternity beds and neonatology incubators in the new centre as there are currently, providing Shaare Zedek with the capability to treat additional local and referred patients.

As a private, not-for-profit institution, Shaare Zedek receives no government funding for development, new equipment, expansion of services or capital improvements and must rely on local and international friends to maintain its high standards.

Elise and Harvey Kalles are tribute committee co-chairs for the event, with Maxwell Gotlieb and Len Glickman as fundraising co-chairs, Michael Bregman as head of the major gifts committee and Barbara Bregman as chair of the event committee.

For further information, call Sheila Dropkin, national executive director of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation at 416-781-3584 or 1-800-387-3595.

Alternative medical treatments thriving

By TERESA STRASSER
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO – Herbs, acupuncture, amulets, crystals, touch therapy, creative imagery and other alternative treatments are increasingly being used to treat everything from lower back pain to AIDS.

In fact, in 1994, the New England Journal of Medicine reported that more Americans seek health care from alternative medicine practitioners than from primary care physicians.

But is alternative medicine sanctioned by Jewish teachings?

Two physicians, a psychiatrist and a rabbi, discussed the question as part of the Seventh Annual International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics, recently held in Burlingame, Calif. According to physician Fred Rosner, modern alternative treatments reflect ancient Jewish healing practices. For instance, Jews often used amulets filled with herbs, roots and written prayers to ward off evil spirits and disease.

Some Jews, including some of Rosner's patients, wear amulets today.

Jewish teachings indicate than an amulet is proven only after it has cured three people or one person three times," said Rosner, of Queens Hospital Centre in New York City.

As for his own take on alternative treatments, Rosner said that "as a preventive they're OK, but as therapy, they're not so good."

A Jewish approach to alternative medicine should include both prayer and traditional medicine, he said. Talmudic writings warn that faith alone should never usurp traditional medical care as the primary healing tool.

"Patients can't rely on divine intervention. It's a supplement, not a substitution," Rosner said.

In fact, Rosner believes that faith in any therapy can have a "placebo effect."

Dr. Leonard Zegans, professor of psychiatry and director of education at the University of California in San Francisco, also acknowledged that "spiritual and emotional factors effect health."

For that reason, prayer, chanting, charms, crystals and other alternative treatments that address diet, lifestyle and state of mind can have benefits.

"Negative images can be perceived as threats to our security.

"They have a profound effect and can affect the health of humans," Zegans said.

Noting that Maimonides wrote that the mind and body cannot be separated, Zegans quoted the Jewish thinker as saying that "joyful news should be around the sick."

With the current trend toward managed health care, physicians have less time to spend with patients, less time to consider such mind and body factors as spiritual contentment and stress.

According to Zegans, this lack of time, as well as the medical establishment's lack of success with chronic conditions, has set the stage for the new prominence of alternative treatments.

Physician Martin Rossman was trained in traditional Western medicine but has practiced acupuncture for the last 23 years. He is the founder and director of the Collaborative Medicine Centre and co-director of the Academy for Guided Imagery, both in Mill Valley, Calif.

After seeing a film of a man having part of his lung removed with only needles as anesthesia, Rossman became fascinated with the ancient healing method.

Evidence about the usefulness of acupuncture "is anecdotal and more research should be done, but 10 million anecdotes is a lot, especially when they're all pointing in the right direction," Rossman said.

While there was palpable cynicism in the audience of physicians toward alternative treatments in general and their compliance with Jewish law specifically, Rabbi Meir Sendor, of the Young Israel Congregation in Sharon, Mass., told the group that prayer "can have direct somatic impact" and is considered in the Jewish tradition to be therapeutic.

"Illness is solipsistic, self-absorption leading to neurosis," Sendor said.

"Healing involves a shift to The Other, a shift to God, who is more inside us than we are in ourselves."

CARRADY, Morris - On March 26, 1996. Will be sadly missed by wife Rochelle & daughters Pamela, Vivien & Monica and son-in-law Doron Eisen. Loving Papa to Jared & Jonah. Contributions with thanks to the Carrady Fund, Reena Foundation, 416-787-0133. Shiva private.

Dear Ella,

I am a 36-year-old man and have never been married. My relationships have been few and most of my dates (especially the blind dates) have been near disasters. About eight months ago, I met a wonderful woman, Sari, and we seem to be moving in a serious direction.

My problem is the Passover seders. Sari would like me to spend one of the seders with her family. She intends also on spending one of the seders with my family.

Here is where the problem comes in. My father passed away four years ago and since that time I have always been the one to conduct the seders. It is one of the only times we all have a chance to get together and it has become customary that I run the seders. I have two younger brothers and a sister, but they have no clue about how to run a seder or even how to read Hebrew properly.

I am really torn about what to do. Since the death of my father, my mother has become very fragile and she will be upset if I am not there for the seders. Sari on the other hand will be hurt as well. We've always been able to compromise and it seems so cut and dried to her that we will spend one seder with her family and one with mine.

Well Ella, what do you think I should do?

Pressured at Passover

Dear Pressured at Passover,

It is time to decide in which direction you want your life to go.

If your relationship is serious, it seems inevitable that this problem is one you will have to face head on sooner or later.

The death of a spouse or a parent is very traumatic and some people take longer to put their lives back on track than others. But the fact remains, that life does move on, and so should you.

Celebrate one seder with your family and one with Sari's. At the same time, try to help your family get through the first year without you there. Teach your brothers how to conduct a seder in English. There are many haggadot that are easy to follow and have instructions of what should be done at every stage of the seder.

This will be a change for your family. A missing relative from the seder table is always difficult, but I'm sure that they don't want to hold you back from starting a new life for yourself.

Go forward and enjoy your seders. Chag Kasher V'Samayach.

MATZA APPLE/CINNAMON TREATS

4 dry matza
1/2 stick margarine or butter, softened
1/2 cup sugar
1/2 tsp cinnamon
1 apple, thinly sliced (unpeeled)
2 tblsp honey (for drizzling)

Preheat oven to 450°. Preparation time: 15 mins. Yield: 5 servings. Wrap broiler pan with aluminum foil and set aside. In small bowl, combine cinnamon and sugar and set aside. Take matza and generously butter both sides and generously sprinkle both sides with cinnamon/sugar mixture, making sure to cover entire matza. Place coated matza onto broiler pan and arrange sliced apples on top. Sprinkle tops of matza with some more cinnamon/sugar mixture and then drizzle with honey. Bake in broiler approx. 3-4 mins. ... Enjoy!

Passover products pulled in Quebec

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) is asking for a meeting "as soon as possible" with officials from the Office de la Langue Française (OFL) to find out what provoked certain stores into yanking from their shelves New York-imported Passover foods with English-only labels, just as the community was stocking up for Passover.

"We always thought we had an agreement with the office," said David Sultan, CJC-Q's community relations director. "This is the first time in my memory this has happened during Passover."

At least two stores, Maxi's in Pointe Claire, owned by Provigo Inc., and a Metro store in the West end, removed the English-only-labelled Passover goods after receiving a letter from the OFL, which acts as watchdog for Quebec's French-language charter, saying the products contravened the French-language requirement provisions of the law.

Sultan, however, suggested the apparent crackdown may have broken an agreement reached a decade ago with the OFL, exempting the Jewish community from the strict French-language requirements of the charter under certain circumstances, such as during the Passover period.

A 1986 document issued by the OFL advisory board urges the office to tolerate the sale of non-French-labelled products "of a religious type" under certain conditions.

Sultan also said Article 5 (c) of Section 51 of the charter also allows for sale of goods not conforming to French-only requirements, provided that there is "very limited use" of such goods and so long as "equivalent replacement" products with French labelling are not already available.

Sultan said CJC-Q, after hearing of some complaints prior to Passover, had been in contact with officials from the OFL, who, he said, assured Congress that the issue would be resolved after the holiday. But Sultan said the OFL may have broken that promise by sending an inspector to the Maxi's store and intimidating its management into removing the products from the shelves.

Foreign adoptions: issues and answers

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Special Report

It's not that Sheli Braun of Ottawa has it in for Toronto, but she associates the city with one of the more negative experiences in her multi-hued family's life.

While attending a family simchah last year at a Toronto-area Orthodox congregation, Braun's five adopted children, each born in a different country and each a slightly different shade of brown, encountered what their mother bluntly calls "the most obnoxious, revolting experience they ever had."

It seems there was lots of whispering and finger-pointing. The children were stared at and no one was willing to play with or even talk to them.

While this isn't your average Orthodox family, the kids are Jewish, adopted children of an Orthodox rabbi, properly converted and raised in an observant home. But they are different.

In Ottawa, where the family has lived since 1993 after living in Denver for three years and Winnipeg before that, "people sometimes stare, but I don't consider that unusual," Braun says. The family's Toronto trip – a sojourn to the big city gone sour – was "the most appalling situation we ever faced."

The Braun family. Top: Rabbi Ely and Sheli; centre: Yoni and Ranit; bottom: (l-r) Elisheva, David and Naomi.

For Braun and her husband, Rabbi Ely Braun, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Orthodox Congregation Beth Shalom, the disturbing experience served as a microcosmic example of the Jewish community's sometimes open displays of skepticism, ignorance and outright racism when it comes to Jews who aren't white, even if they are shomer mitzvot and receive a Jewish education.

Elisheva Braun, 15, was born in Colombia; Ranit, 13, in Chile; Yonatan, 10, in Brazil. Naomi, 9, is of Ethiopian-Jewish heritage; and the biological parents of David, 3, were African-American. Proud Jews, all. They attend local Jewish schools. the boys wear kippot. Dating for the eldest daughter is a long way off.

But Sheli Braun, 45, is not blind to the problems of acceptance her children face, especially when it comes to friendship, dating and marriage within a community that is overwhelmingly white and, to put it mildly, skittish about who its young people marry.

"I think Naomi, because she looks Ethiopian, will be okay," her mother allows. However, David, the African-American, "is going to have trouble as a black male. But I hope that eventually, all the children will find someone accepting of who they are Jewishly, and that the issue of race will be overcome."

But will her children remain Orthodox? Will they even remain Jewish? Braun sighs. "Coming to parenthood later in life, you get to be pragmatic. All you can do is love them and give them a Jewish home. After that, you pray. It's a crapshoot. Listen, it happens in biological families too, where children make choices."

Ultimately, the Brauns are optimistic. "I think the children will be mistreated at various points," says Braun, the principal of the day school at a local Reform temple. "But I think the Jewish world is coming around and that there are enough accepting people out there."

Foreign adoptions open identity issues

[Cont'd. from page 1]

Special Report

Looking 'Jewish'

"That's funny. You don't look Jewish." Is that a refrain an Oriental or black adoptee of Jewish parents can look forward to? Although Judaism is a religion and not a race, most Canadian Jews have rather fixed ideas about who does and doesn't "look" Jewish, despite the fact that conversions and intermarriages have produced blue-eyed, fair-haired and even dark-skinned Jews. And the "who is a Jew" controversy continues to percolate around the world.

With the extreme shortage of babies and young children to adopt within Canada, both through public and private agencies, and the fact that one in five Jewish marriages struggles with infertility, more and more Jewish couples are turning to foreign countries. Today's "hot" markets are China and Russia, but others include South and Central America and the United States.

Adoption in Canada is regulated by the provinces (see part I of this series, CJN, April 3, p. B-12). In most jurisdictions, including Ontario, there are three ways to adopt: public agencies; the private route, using licensed practitioners; and going overseas. In Quebec, foreign adoptions are handled by the Secrétariat à l'adoption internationale du Québec, a government agency.

International adoptions can be complex, confusing and expensive. Provincial laws governing adoption, federal immigration rules and the laws of the child's country of origin must be observed for the adoption to be valid.

And foreign adoptions come with their own set of cultural issues. Most adoption counsellors advise prospective adoptive parents of a non-white child to look at the community in which they live. What is its tolerance threshold? What about schools, friends and family? They're cute as babies, but what happens when that beautiful

'Emotionally white'

Costa Rican or Chinese child grows up? Will their three identities (Canadian, Jewish, Chinese) conflict? Or will that black child one day find himself torn between Jewish anti-black prejudice and black anti-Semitism? Will the Russian child lash out at her adoptive parents for robbing her of her original culture?

And what happens when he or she begins to date, a scenario straight out of Guess Who's Coming to Dinner? wherein even the most liberal Jews would be tested if their son or daughter brought home a black or Vietnamese friend? You can almost hear it: "But Daddy, he's Jewish!"

"Most Jewish families are Caucasian," observes Michaele-Sue Goldblatt, a leading Vancouver-based expert who had a private adoption practice in Ontario for 11 years, adding that most Jewish families want white babies.

To couples considering a foreign adoption in a non-white country, "I used to suggest they look at their larger environment, not only their family and friends. Will the child be truly accepted by the whole Jewish community? Or when that adorable black baby becomes an adult, will other members of the Jewish community say to their children, 'We don't want you to date him'?"

Goldblatt hopes that Jewish families can "positively incorporate" their adopted child's heritage into its upbringing.

Such social issues will "probably" diminish as inter-racial conversions and adoptions become more prevalent, according to Rabbi Michael Gold, author of the breakthrough 1988 book And Hannah Wept — Infertility, Adoption and the Jewish Couple. "Yet the problems," he warns, "should not be dismissed lightly by adoptive parents."

Joyce Cohen, a retired professor of social work at the University of Toronto and now an adoption researcher, agrees. "Parents have to be ready to deal with being different. They have to realize that once they bring in a non-white child, they become a mixed-race family. The first thing they have to deal with is whether they want to become a mixed-race family."

Issues surrounding identity within multi-ethnic families are much more prevalent in the United States than Canada. (All five Braun children were adopted while the couple lived in the U.S.) According to the National Adoption Study by University of Guelph professors Michael Sobel and Kerry Daly, there were roughly 2,400 foreign adoptions completed in Canada in 1991, compared to the 1,700 children under a year old who were placed locally through Children's Aid societies like Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Service or Montreal's Batshaw Youth and Family Services.

Adopting a child from a foreign country was virtually unheard of until the post-war period. Canada's first wave consisted primarily of children orphaned by World War II and the conflicts in Korea and Vietnam.

The second wave began in 1975 following changes to immigration laws, and brought adoptees mainly from poor countries, including India, Bangladesh, Central and South America and Haiti, and more recently, Romania and China.

In 1994, Cohen and Prof. Anne Westhues of Wilfred Laurier University issued the results of a landmark study on intercountry adoption in Canada. It examined how 155 non-white young people who had been adopted as infants and small children by white (but not Jewish) parents fared in terms of acculturation and identity. The results surprised many.

In a nutshell, the study found that all the adoptees identified themselves as Canadian and, as Cohen puts it, "as white — emotionally."

That's good news and bad news, she explains. "The fact that they identified themselves as emotionally white means they felt they belonged to these families. They had made an attachment.

"The downside is that somewhere along the line, they still had to do some work on the fact that they looked different. It means their identities are not yet complete. It means it takes maturity to absorb

Ross ruling gives Jews extra reason to celebrate

By PAUL McKEAGUE
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Supreme Court of Canada gave Jews something extra to celebrate at Passover this year.

On the eve of the religious holiday, it ruled unanimously that teachers who express intolerant views toward Jews and other groups can be banned from the classroom.

The decision, which dealt with Malcolm Ross, an anti-Semitic teacher from New Brunswick, emphasizes the responsibility of school boards to ensure children are educated in an environment unpoisoned by prejudice.

As Jews gathered at the seder table to commemorate their liberation from oppression thousands of years ago, they could give thanks that the highest court in the land ruled that "intolerance will not be tolerated," said Bernie Farber, national director of Canadian Jewish Congress.

The ruling closely follows the Supreme Court of Canada's decision against James Keegstra, the anti-Semitic former school teacher from Alberta.

Congress, which took an active role in the Ross case, believes the decision will have a major impact on the interpretation of human rights legislation throughout Canada.

Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada who were also intervenors in the case, applauded the Supreme Court decision, saying it "promotes human rights and equal opportunity for all students."

But Ross' lawyer, Doug Christie, said the ruling destroys the freedoms of expression and religion.

"This judgment eliminates freedom of expression for anyone in a position where they could be a role model, and that doesn't just mean teachers," he said. "It could apply to doctors, policemen, certainly judges, lawyers [and] professors."

Christie said all religions are discriminatory" because they claim to be the truth even though their beliefs on questions like the divinity of Christ contradict other religions.

"When you say you cannot preach, hold or express a religious opinion that is discriminatory, you are in effect saying you cannot hold or express a religious opinion at all," Christie maintained.

While teaching in the Moncton area, Ross wrote books, pamphlets and letters to newspapers claiming that Christian civilization was being destroyed by a global Jewish conspiracy.

In 1988, David Attis, a Jew from Moncton, filed a complaint with the Human Rights Commission of New Brunswick.

Attis maintained that the school board was condoning Ross' behavior and violating the Human Rights Act by failing to take appropriate action in response to his racist and bigoted public statements.

A human rights board of inquiry found no evidence that Ross had expressed his anti-Jewish views inside the classroom, but they were well-known in the community.

And the board heard evidence that Jewish students faced intimidation and derogatory name-calling. It was told that other students did the Heil Hitler salute and drew swastikas on their own arms, on the desks of Jewish children and on blackboards.

The human rights board ordered that Ross be barred from the classroom, although it said he could be given a non-teaching position in the school system.

But the matter went to the Supreme Court after the Court of Appeal ruled that the ban violated Ross' rights to freedom of expression and freedom of religion.

The Supreme Court agreed that Ross' rights had been infringed, but it concluded this was justifiable because he was poisoning the school system with intolerance and prejudice.

"Young students are especially vulnerable to the messages conveyed by their teachers," Justice Gerard LaForest wrote.

The ruling will allow Ross to keep his current position as a school librarian, a job that is threatened by downsizing in the New Brunswick school system. Ross can also continue to publish his views.

But Farber served notice that Congress will be watching his statements very closely. If any of them fit the strict definition of hate propaganda, Congress will ask the attorney general of New Brunswick "to lay the proper charges," he said.

JNF launches new Negev development

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish National Fund (JNF), in cooperation with the Jewish Agency and the Ministry of Agriculture, has launched a major development plan in Israel's last frontier, the Negev Desert.

The two-part plan, whose broad objective is to prepare the Negev for the 21st century, is expected to cost about $400 million (US) during the first phase and upward of $150 million (US) in the second, disclosed JNF chair Moishe Rivlin in an interview.

Here recently to address a JNF dinner, Rivlin said the chief aim of Action Plan: Negev, as it is formally known, is to enlarge the agricultural export sector.

"We intend to develop 50,000 to 60,000 acres, and in Israel that's a lot," observed Rivlin, a seventh-generation sabra. "We are champions in the world in dealing with arid and semi-arid zones."

Calling the Negev the "future of Israel," Rivlin said the plan will bring citrus groves, olive plantations, fish ponds and hothouses to Israel's largest land reserve.

And if the plan — which is already a year ahead of schedule — is successful, it could double the number of settlements in the Negev.

Rivlin said that more settlers will be attracted to the hot and dusty Negev once they are persuaded they can earn a good living there.

In the initial phase, 40 percent of the costs are expected to be borne by Jews in the Diaspora, 40 percent by the Israeli government and 20 percent by the settlers themselves.

When that stage is completed in three years from now, Rivlin wants private investors to become involved.

Ultimately, the success of the plan hinges not only on fundraising efforts, but on Israel's ability to extract more water from the Negev through drilling and a system of reservoirs and dams.

Interestingly enough, the plan is vitally dependent on cooperation from Jordan, which signed a peace treaty with Israel in October 1994.

According to Rivlin, Israel and Jordan intend to build three to four dams in the Arava, which extends from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Eilat.

And in line with an ambitious land reclamation project, Israel plans to use salt-free Jordanian soil on its side of the boundary.

Rivlin said it costs 10 to 20 times more to develop land in the Negev than in the rest of Israel.

He also noted that 40 percent of the JNF's afforestation efforts are concentrated in the Negev. "We plant about three million new trees annually."

Rivlin acknowledged that a disproportionate amount of the Negev is at present utilized by the Israeli armed forces for bases and training purposes. He hopes the military will find a way of giving up some of its reserves to farmers.

Pessimistic appraisals painted of peace process

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In what must have been one of the most pessimistic appraisals of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process yet presented in Toronto, two speakers took turns sounding alarm bells about an imminent disaster facing Israel.

Author Rael Jean Isaac and defence analyst Frank Gaffney Jr. pulled no punches, painting a picture of a Labor-led government of Israel rushing headlong to disaster.

The occasion was a program to discuss The Arafat Tapes, recordings of speeches given by the Palestinian leader to Arab audiences in Gaza and the West Bank over the last two years.

Presented at the start of the program, the speeches are replete with inflammatory rhetoric and references to jihad (holy war), struggles and victory. On several occasions, Arafat refers to a tactical alliance made by the prophet Mohammed with the Quresh tribe that he abrogated two years later when the military equation turned in his favor.

Israelis have an inordinate capacity for self delusion and are providing Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat with a territorial base for a "final solution," said Isaac, a public policy commentator and author of two books on Israeli politics.

Arafat has not abandoned his goal of destroying the State of Israel and holds that aim in common with Hamas, the militant Islamic group, she said. It is that common desire that has brought them together in a tactical alliance and subsumed their differences, she said.

The peace process is "a sham" and the PLO retains its 1974 program of destroying Israel in phases, she said.

For the Labor-led government of Israel, withdrawing from the "burden" of occupying Judea, Samaria and Gaza is more important than real peace. The Oslo agreement provides no quid pro quo from the Palestinians, as the PLO "doesn't promise anything. It just agrees to take what Israel gives," Isaac said.

"[Peres] is a man in the grip of a vision," who believes that with the end of the Cold War, war itself has been made obsolete.

"Peres believes he knows where the forces of history are going and they're going to Utopia." He doesn't allow contrary evidence to sway him from his beliefs and he has predicted that by the year 2000, there will be peace in the Mideast including with Hamas and Islamic Jihad, she said with incredulity.

"Peres lives in the world of delusions," she added.

The peace process has harmed Israel greatly, she continued. It has created rifts in Israeli society and demoralized Jews living outside Israel's pre-1967 borders; it has prevented the Israeli government from protecting its citizens from attacks that originate in areas under Palestinian control; it has undermined the state's core values and ties to Jewish history; and by turning over territories to Arafat, "the greatest killer of Jews since Hitler," it has reversed Israel's historic and symbolic opposition to terrorism.

Short of a revival of Israel's Zionist spirit, the "long-term outlook is bleak indeed," she said.

Gaffney, who described himself as a "friend of Israel," agreed that Israel is rushing to disaster. The tapes are full of "coded references" to the PLO's 1974 program of phased destruction of Israel. The Palestinian Authority (PA), headed by Arafat, and Hamas have agreed not to attack each other, but "attacks against Israel are okay" if they're from areas outside the PA's control, he said.

Arafat has visited the mothers of suicide bombers, "a signal, a sign" to the Palestinian people, said Gaffney, director for the Centre for Security Policy in Washington and a former U.S. assistant secretary of defence.

Turning to Hafez al-Assad, Gaffney pointed out that the Syrian leader still harbors many terrorists and is conducting economic warfare on the United States by "the wholesale counterfeiting of American currency."

The Golan Heights remain key to Israel's strategic depth even in the age of guided missiles and he warned against placing U.S. troops on the Heights in lieu of Israelis. The United States has let Israel down before, he said.

There are problems for which there are no easy solutions. If the alternative to the peace process is the intifada, survivors of the Holocaust know there are worse things than that, he concluded.

The program, attended by several hundred people at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, was sponsored by One Israel and the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association in conjunction with Herut-Likud Canada, Mizrachi Organization of Canada, National Conference of Synagogue Youth and Betar/Tagar.

March of Living teens put songs to tape

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's not uncommon for teenage participants in the March of the Living (MOL) to share their experience when they return.

Some take a public speaking role, talking about what they learned and how they felt on joining other Jewish students from a myriad of countries to visit concentration camp sites and march — Israeli flags in hand — from Auschwitz to Birkenau, before finishing the trip in Israel.

Mike Anklewicz, 19, chose to share his experience on the 1994 March in a different way. Now a first-year student in the classical music program at Queen's University, Anklewicz has put together an audio cassette that includes six of his original songs and a seventh written by Robert Gasner. The tape also includes traditional songs like Ma Tovu, which were often sung by participants.

Entitled Back to Life: The 1994 March of the Living, the tape features Anklewicz and the MOL choir — Anklewicz, Audrey Kaufman, David Phillips, Emma Sevitt, Myles Steiner, Limore Twena and Albina Veltman. Aside from Kaufman, a chaperone on the trip, all choir members are students from the Toronto contingent.

Back to Life is not to be confused with Songs for the March of the Living 1996, produced as a teaching tool by program staff for Ontario participants in this year's March.

Anklewicz's tape, released last fall, was privately funded. Profits will be donated to the March of the Living.

A prolific songwriter, Anklewicz wrote There is Life Here, the second song on the tape, on his first night in Poland.

To the best of Anklewicz and local March co-ordinators' knowledge, the tape is a unique venture.

"It's just incredible the initiative that one of the participants took in putting this together," said Chaia Berkowitz, 1994 coordinator for the Toronto contingent of the March.

Back to Life is available at Matana Judaica, Negev Book and Gift Store and Israel's in Thornhill, or call Noam Samson at 416-633-8992.

Terrorism's goal to destroy peace process, says Rubin

TORONTO — Terrorism is not a result of the peace process but an attack on the peace process, and its ultimate aim is the destruction of the State of Israel, a leading American peace advocate said recently.

Addressing the annual meeting of Canadian Friends of Peace Now at the Primrose Club, Gary Rubin, CEO and executive director of Americans for Peace Now, told his audience that terrorism began long before the Oslo accords.

Citing statistics, he said that between 1969 and 1985, there were more than 8,000 terrorist attacks, in which over 650 Israelis, mostly civilians, were killed.

Rubin, who led a 20-member delegation to monitor the Palestinian elections in January, just returned from Israel where he attended the funeral of the son of a leading Peace Now supporter in Israel; the young man had been killed in a recent suicide bombing.

"The peace process is integral to combatting terrorism in the long term, and essential to the future well-being of both Israelis and Palestinians," he said.

He placed the onus for combating terrorism on Yasser Arafat and his newly elected Palestinian National Council.

Specifically, he outlined four key demands of the Peace Now movement in Israel.

- The arrest, punishment and detention of all Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorist leaders identified by the Israeli government. (He said seven of the 13 named by Israel had so far been arrested, but this was not good enough.)
- Full disarmament of all independent Palestinian militias wherever they may be. (Forty-one institutions, including mosques, health clinics and the Islamic University in Gaza, have been raided and closed where arms caches have been found, but more should be, he said.)
- Prosecution and punishment of Palestinians who support and assist terrorists.
- Abrogation by May 7 of all the clauses in the PLO Covenant which violate the spirit of the Oslo accords.

Rubin urged continued international funding for Palestinians, in order to allow them to build required economic infrastructure, as well as to take over those health, social and educational services provided by Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Educational program brings Jewish, Arab youth together

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shuli Dichter suggests, only half-jokingly, that even Canada can learn a lesson or two from the innovative educational program he directs in Israel.

Getting them while they're young, the two-year program, compulsory in two dozen Israeli schools, teaches Jewish and Arab teenagers how to live together in a society filled with tension.

The point of Children Teaching Children is that Arab-Jewish coexistence is possible, even as the political ground continues to shift, and even if the entire framework is threatened by suicide bombers.

It began as an experiment in which Jewish and Arab kids taught Hebrew and Arabic to each other (hence its name). That worked for a year, but the results weren't as hoped for.

Undaunted, organizers pressed ahead, committed to the ideal that children are uniquely equipped to engage in a dialogue unencumbered by the suspicion and misinformation their parents may harbor.

The program was approved by Israel's Education Ministry in 1987, and today, Children Teaching Children works in 38 classes in 24 schools, mainly in Israel's northern and central regions.

Some 80 specially-trained teachers instruct over 1,300 students in conflict resolution and life skills, using ice-breakers like art, drama and role-playing. The goal is to use the kids' Israeli citizenship as a common ground for mutual acceptance of both Jewish and Arab citizens of Israel.

For two hours a week, the students, mainly in grades 7, 8 and 9 and in groups of 12 to 15, learn to appreciate what Dichter calls "different approaches to life. The kids learn a basic understanding of the legitimacy of their differences. They get a good sense and grounding of their own identity."

This isn't a cross-cultural experience, stressed Dichter, here recently on a fundraising trip. With few exceptions, Israeli Arabs and Jews live apart in homogeneous communities and almost never meet. University is usually the first place where Jews and Arab. encounter one another and by then, prejudices and stereotypes are often set, he said.

Shuli Dichter

But given that 18 percent of Israel proper's population is Palestinian, living in the Jewish state requires special skills. The two sides, Dichter said, "learn to stop seeing the other as the villains. They deal with their fears."

There are no textbooks and no written rules. The teachers are trained in twice-yearly workshops and work with several field coordinators. Classes from Jewish and Arab schools are paired for the length of the program, with students and teachers meeting each other regularly throughout the school year. The sessions, Dichter said are often "high-voltage." Kids express themselves freely within the safe confines of a classroom.

Children Teaching Children is a project of Givat Haviva, founded in 1949 and today Israel's largest and oldest organization advancing Jewish-Arab rapprochement and pluralistic values. Each year, some 40,000 people take part in Givat Haviva's educational programs.

Dichter, a one-time youth and hechalutz shaliach in Toronto, pointed out that Children Teaching Children has been studied by conflict-resolution experts in Northern Ireland, Belgium and Switzerland.

But there's more to the conflict in Israel than the one between Arabs and Jews, he added. The program also encourages dialogue between secular Jewish teens and their counterparts in yeshivot, as well as exchanges between Israeli Arab youth and young West Bank and Gaza Arabs.

The program is apolitical, Dichter stressed. "We don't preach peace or passive non-violence. We think about the future."

Parents urged to discuss sexuality with teens

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Parents and educators should encourage discussions with teens about sex, sexuality and the role they play in Judaism, says Rabbi Mitchell Cohen, director of Camp Ramah.

"To miss the opportunity of sharing what Judaism has to say about these matters is to miss a great opportunity to make Judaism an even more important part of their lives," he said at a recent lecture sponsored by the AIDS committee of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. The lecture was the second of three aimed at various age groups and sectors of the community.

Rabbi Cohen, who has developed a curriculum for teaching Jewish ethics to parents and educators, has initiated a series of lessons at Camp Ramah geared towards staff and 15- and 16-year-old campers. He told the group of adults and teenagers that sexual and social decision-making can be quite stressful.

"There is a dilemma in Judaism. We are working within a halachic system that prohibits sexual relations outside of marriage, but we do know that changes have altered Halachah. The standards for sexual behavior were promulgated at a time when the average age of marriage was 14 or 15 years old.

"The dilemma occurs when we talk to Jewish parents who say they want their kids to get married when their education is complete. What, then, do we tell kids to do with their bodies between the ages of 15 and 23? There is a problem in applying halachic standards to modern sociological conditions."

Within the proper context, says Rabbi Cohen, sex can be wonderful and it is up to adults to talk to teenagers about what is the proper context.

"Jewish philosophy differs from Christianity in that in Judaism our physical drives are not negative. Eating, sex and economics can either be wonderful or lead to sin. The healthy message to communicate is that sex is not bad, dirty or wrong."

Rabbi Cohen's curriculum teaches that sexuality plays a role in the lives of teenagers and that Judaism must be relevant when making sexual decisions.

"If Jewish tradition is important, then Jewish values should be important. It is pointless to say that Judaism is important but not with regards to sexuality.

"Even if one disagrees with the Jewish tradition of having sex only in marriage, Judaism can still be relevant. We should tell these kids that even though they disagree, they can choose levels within which they are comfortable. It is important to learn what Judaism has to say and draw out the lessons we can learn."

People must be responsible when making sexual decisions and never allow the heat of the moment to violate their own standards, he stresses.

"Teens need to speak to others and get the message that the permanence of marital relations makes the concept of sex more legitimate. It is important to teach young people that they have to create standards and stick to them. Society creates pressures on teens but these pressures should be seen as a challenge and decisions should not be made because of pressure."

He says that health and safety are only the first level of responsible sex. "We must also be concerned with respect for partners. It is not enough to teach kids to use condoms. That is important, but it is also important to go beyond that level. We do not want to see people engage in casual sex.

"Ethical behavior means mutual desire and readiness. If one needs to be convinced, that is coercive, which is against Jewish values. If sexuality is important, then we must allow Jewish ethics to influence our decision-making."

When asked how early parents should talk to their teens about sex, Rabbi Cohen said it is important to talk openly at all ages. "Then young people will feel that they can talk to us. Bar mitzvah age is a wonderful time to start discussions about sexuality. I do not believe that talking about sex encourages young people to take part in it at an earlier age."

Yom Hashoah

The 27th day of Nisan this year falls on April 16.

Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah is commemorated on that day because it is considered to be the day when the resistance in the Warsaw ghetto, led by a small courageous group, mostly youngsters, spread into a general uprising.

In truth however, the Shoah, the Holocaust, is a word without meaning. It is a wound left agape in the Jewish soul for all time. It cannot be "understood;" it cannot be closed and it can never be healed. The dimension of the evil perpetrated upon the Jewish people and upon all of humankind exceeds human comprehension in the manner that the oceans exceed a brook or the mountains exceed a hilltop.

The single human being cannot truly comprehend and register death, let alone torture, cruelty and barbarity, on a macro level. We were not intended to. Otherwise how are we to understand the rabbinic decree that even a single life is an entire universe of love and goodness and unique possibility all its own?

But, how can we — single human beings, part of the Jewish people, and part of the community of decent, civilized humanity — not comprehend the full horror of what was done and what was lost in the Shoah? In the faces of our parents, the survivors, we can only glimpse at what it was. But in the faces of our children we can see it with the clarity of full truth.

When the night-time darkness is at its fullest depth, and we look heavenward far into the black eternity, we are overcome with numbing grief and heartbreaking sadness to realize that even the stars that we can count in the vast sky are fewer than the number of children that were murdered by the Nazis.

V'hagvurah

The Nazis entered the Warsaw ghetto in an armored column on Passover eve 5703, April 19, 1943. They met with resistance, were beaten back and retreated with heavy casualties. They struck again and again and again. But after each attack they were beaten back. Eventually, they destroyed and razed to the ground every building in the ghetto.

The battle in the Warsaw ghetto lasted officially for more than six weeks. At the end of May 1943, the Nazi commander in charge of the "aktion" declared success. But as Yehuda Bauer, the eminent Israeli historian has noted, "fighting continued in the ruins of the ghetto. We have testimonies which speak of shooting in the ghetto area even as late as October, and very reliable evidence for such occurrence in September. In any case it is clear that the fighting went on for many weeks. We do not even know who did the fighting ..."

It is not likely that there were more than 750 Jewish fighters in the ghetto. As Bauer writes: "This was a great uprising ... the few against the many ... the war fought by these people was conducted for the sake of vengeance on the mass murderers, for the defence of Jewish national honor and for the future. This was an important factor in the whole battle: to let the Jewish people know that Jews had been there, that Jews knew and that Jews fought ..."

The last testimony of Mordechai Anielewicz, the young leader who perished in the uprising, is eloquent proof of Bauer's observation. "The dream of my life has become true. Jewish self-defence in the Warsaw ghetto has become a fact. Jewish armed resistance and revenge have become a reality."

When the night-time darkness is at its fullest depth, and we look heavenward far into the black eternity, trying to comprehend the meaning of the Shoah, overcome with grief and sadness, we must seek and find our courage in the g'vurah, the heroism of the few, who, in every generation of Jewish history, fought against the many for the sake of their children and their parents to build a better world.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

If you are afraid, hope will be lost.

This Week in Canadian Jewish History

April 6, 1944 The S.S. Serpa Pinto arrived in Philadelphia carrying 280 Canada-bound refugees, most of them Jews. This was the first of three groups which escaped Europe via Portugal. Their entry was negotiated by Saul Hayes. (Canadian Jewish Agenda, CJC 1995)

Legal aid needed for a just society

The attorney general's claim that despite the cut in funding, his government still spends more on legal aid than any other provincial government in Canada, is not quite accurate. The real issue would be the amount spent on legal aid per person requiring the assistance of counsel. As this government has announced its intention to cut off legal aid certificates after the first 60,000 are issued, the amount thereafter spent per person will be very easy to calculate: zero. Legal representation to those in need must be provided if there is to be any hope for a future just society.

Peace is good for Israel's economy

It is vital that Israel continues to strive for peace, if it intends to flourish economically. In the last year, Israel's economy grew by more than seven percent. This growth can be largely attributed to the political stability of the region, which is a result of the Middle East peace negotiations. Due to the Israeli peace efforts, the Arab boycott of Israeli goods is crumbling and the markets of Asia and the Far East are also opening to Israeli goods. These exports account for 30 percent of Israeli corporate profits. In addition, the Israeli stock market has also been performing well and was considered one of the best performing markets of last year.

This latest threat to the peace negotiations has caused a tremor to run through the Israeli economy. Since the Hamas suicide bombings, the Mishtanim index of the top 100 blue-chip stocks has fallen by more than one percent. If Israel cannot establish peace it will mean disaster for the economy. It is obvious that Israel has received economic benefits from the peace process. The process needs to be re-established if Israel is to become an economic giant of the Middle East and the world.

Mission was context for Jewish history

Having recently returned from UIA's Canada 3000 Mission to Israel, I feel compelled to publicly acknowledge how superb were its planning and organization.

Planners pulled together a variety of events and experiences for first-timers and veteran visitors alike, infusing us all with heightened pride and awareness of the achievements of Israel in general and the role of Canadian Jews in Israel in particular. From Metulla to Eilat, we bused, hiked across the land, walking through the Judean hills and the desert of the Negev with the Bible as our guide, meeting with Israelis, young and old, religious and secular, supporters and rejectionists of the current peace process, new olim and sabras.

We experienced the hope and material progress resulting from the peace process, followed by a series of savage terrorist attacks which plunged everyone into the darkest fear and despair. Perhaps it would be helpful to recall that there have been other dark chapters in Jewish history over which the Jewish people have prevailed and ultimately triumphed. Our mission to Israel put all of this into stark relief.

Outraged at TV show

I am writing this letter because of the outrageous program Face Off, shown recently on CBC-TV Newsworld.

Face Off was devoted to the Arab-Israeli peace process in the aftermath of the ghastly suicide bombings. Both hosts, Claire Hoy (who co-authored a book on Victor Ostrovsky about the latter's "exposé" of the Mossad) and Judy Rebick, made opening statements sympathetic to the Palestinians. Rebick also mentioned that the show would feature only the Palestinian side.

The two guests were Rashad Saleh of the local Palestine House and Norman Finkelstein. Both emphasized, outrageously, that it was the Palestinians who were suffering because of "collective punishment," and not the Israelis, victims of grisly suicide bombings. The anguish of the Jews was all but dismissed.

Perspectives

Mimouna's origins linked to Rambam's family

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

G-d gave the Torah to the people of Israel and the people of Israel have added an important aspect to the law or Halachah, namely, custom or minhag.

A minhag is based on and connected to a mitzvah, the commandment. Whereas the Halachah is the same for all Jews, the minhag varies according to the country; and even within a country, it is often specific to certain communities.

For example, the Halachah enjoins Jews to observe Shabbat and the minhagim add ways to honor, beautify and glorify that day. The minhagim, however, will not be as universal and uniform for the Jewish world as the positive and negative mitzvot pertaining to the observance of Shabbat.

Minhagim fill the important function of emphasizing the feeling of belonging to a group and of strenthening the emotions of the community by adding a specific character to a holiday, such as what foods to prepare, what foods to avoid and what clothes to wear. (In many Sephardi communities, for example, olives disappear from the table on Shabbat because it is a staple food during the shivah.)

The minhag, of course, is mainly oral rather than written, since it is kept and transmitted from generation to generation. Sons and daughters learn them in their parents' home, observe them in their own home and teach them to their sons and daughters. This is also why the minhag can be weak. Its preservation often depends on community acceptance and social circumstances.

Today in Israel, for example, with kibbutz galuyot (the ingathering of all the Jewish communities of the world), the early immigration policy of the "melting pot," the changes in family structure and size, the prevailing secular character of Israeli education, unisex clothes and people's craving for pizza and hamburger, minhagim are sadly and unavoidably at great risk of disappearing altogether.

Among the most distinctive and compelling minhagim known to the Sephardi communities of the Machrek and the Magreb (respectively the Middle East and North Africa) is the Mimouna. The theories surrounding its origins are many; two of them are linked to the family of the Rambam (Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon).

One theory states that the devastating news about the death of the Rambam reached the community of Libya, and especially Tripoli, during Passover, but they had to wait until the end of the holiday to have the traditional seudat avra'ah, or mourning meal in honor of the Rambam, which they called the Mimouna. Not everyone, however, accepts this explanation since not all the Sephardi communities which traditionally observe this minhag heard the sad news at the same time. Moreover, the Mimouna is a happy occasion, whereas seudat avra'ah, obviously, is not.

The second explanation linking the Maimon family to the Mimouna is that the Rambam's father died on isru chag Pesach, the end of the festival of Pesach. Since we cannot commemorate his hiloula, which is a sad event, during the month of Nisan, a month of rejoicing and happiness, then we have the Mimouna instead.

This explanation seems to be more in tune with the general philosophy of the Sephardim not to miss an opportunity to celebrate, especially around the time of religious holidays.

Portraits of the man Moses Maimonides (ben Maimon), known acronymically as the Rambam, after whom, many scholars believe, the Mimouna festival was named. The statue of Maimonides by Victor Laredo is in Cordova, Spain. Inset is the most famous portrait of the Rambam, with his name appearing in his own handwriting.

A third explanation more generally accepted derives from the word emunah (belief). We know we were saved from slavery and Pharaoh's cruel treatment in the month of Nisan and we believe our second and last redemption will also occur in that month. Thus, we have a very festive meal and gathering at the end of Pesach to express our optimistic belief in our final redemption in the month of Nisan.

A fourth explanation is that we were not allowed to rejoice and be totally happy without some measure of restraint during Pesach, due to the fact that the Egyptians drowned. G-d asked us to be considerate: "My creations are drowning and you are singing songs of praise to me." (Sanhedrin tractate 39). We heed G-d's injunction to the point that we do not recite the Hallel in its entirety during Pesach, but only half of it. The Sephardim therefore make up for this restraint in enjoyment and merrymaking. by granting themselves an extra occasion to celebrate during the month of Nisan — the Mimouna.

It is customary for young unmarried people to go on a picnic in the country on the first day after Pesach, i.e. on the day of the Mimouna. They are usually accompanied by adults and, according to the folklore, the parents of many a young man on the following day, would ask for the hand of the girl who caught the eye and conquered the heart of their son the day before during the Mimouna outing.

There are quite a few other minhagim unrelated to the Mimouna, but linked to Pesach and the month of Nisan.

Nisan is the first month of the Jewish year. On Rosh Chodesh Nisan, the first day of the month, the tabernacle or mishkan, built according to Moses' instructions, was inaugurated. To commemorate this important event, the Jews of Libya and Tunisia prepare a flour-like mixture of roasted and very finely ground grains such as barley, wheat, rye and sorghum, and spices such as anise and coriander seeds. The mixture called bessissa, smells divine and the children love it. Olive oil, brown sugar and dates are added and the youngest child in the family mixes all these ingredients with a key, preferably a gold one. Everyone gathers around the table to eat the bessissa and sing songs of praise and piyoutim.

That evening, while lighting the candil (heat-proof glass full of water and olive-oil) of Rosh Chodesh, married women drop their wedding bands in it and leave it there overnight. In the morning, when they go to retrieve their ring, they usually find another small piece of gold jewelry in the glass that the husband surreptitiously added overnight. The wife's parting with her wedding band for a night is to remind us that women gladly gave up their jewelry to contribute to the building of the mishkan even as most of them had refused to contribute in any way to the making of the golden calf. The husband's gift is in appreciation of his wife's dedication to him, to their family and their religious traditions.

A mitzvah-minhag common to all the holidays but done with greater care for Pesach is the cleaning of the synagogue. Benches, cushions and silver memorial lamps were washed and put out in the sun to dry; winter wool carpets were cleaned, rolled away and replaced with fresher straw mats; walls were washed and painted and floors were scrubbed. Women and children would leaf through the books looking for crumbs of bread or any other chametz. This was a very popular minhag, because children loved it and families used to compete for the honor of doing it.

One of the central minhagim of Pesach dealt with the paschal lamb. A month or so before Pesach, each family would buy a little lamb and keep him in their backyard. For a few weeks, the air would be filled with his bleating and children would get quite attached to their temporary pet, until one morning ... ominous silence! The little lamb, much fatter than on arrival, had been taken to the slaughter house and the shochet had done his job. Pauvre petit agneau! Every single little piece of him which was ritually fit for consumption would indeed be consumed and his skin would end up on some floor or wall of the house.

Opinions

Out of Mitzrayim

By Jean M. Gerber

With the seders behind me, I reflect on more than 30 years of reading the Haggadah.

My first seder was held in the cramped quarters of a graduate student apartment. What a motley crowd we were: Jews, non-Jews and agnostics, black and white. The Jewish students were homesick for their own seders, even though they knew little beyond the menu. This seder, taking place at the dawn of the civil rights movement in the United States, had more than a touch of polemic just in its very happening. Everyone took away the message of freedom (especially since the apartment in which we celebrated was shared by a black and a Jewish roommate and was not supposed to be rented to blacks). How hopeful we were that the days of discrimination were soon to pass.

Once married, my husband and I began to create our own seder customs, blending traditional ones we attended as newlyweds with the songs our young children learned in Hebrew school. How proud they were when they mastered the Haggadah. They are still the only ones in our family who can sing the final verses to Chad Gadyah without stumbling badly.

One year we had a house full of Israelis. The formal seder ended about midnight, but all remained well into the wee small hours to sing every Israeli song we knew, ending with the new anthem, Jerusalem of Gold. We were filled with hope that a golden era for the Middle East was about to dawn.

In 1975, we celebrated our seder in Jerusalem, in a country just beginning to recover after the Yom Kippur War. Since we felt obligated to do two seders, we carefully followed the order of the service on the first night up until the grace after meals, at which time the kids had all fallen asleep. Then we came back the next night and concentrated on discussion. During the Hallel, our first born, who by this time had some command of Hebrew, piped up: "If they have ears, why can't they hear? And eyes — why can't they see?" Oh, that teachable moment every parent longs for had finally happened! That story too became a part of the family seder tradition.

Every year we invite students who are far from home. One year we hosted a Jewish football player! He was also an honor student, but this didn't impress our offspring, by now pretty cocky about their Hebrew. "We'll leave him in the dust" they thought.

As we started around the table, each reading in turn, the kids flashed their fluent reading. Then came the student, the most fluent of all. I won't reveal the name of the Ontario day school that should take credit, but he too contributed to our growing seder lore!

One year, when I was 10½ months pregnant, the whole family — including grandparents on both sides — ended up at the rabbi's seder table. The ba'al haseder left the room and came back with his travelling pack, to be asked, "Where are you going?" "To Jerusalem!" came the reply. Three generations, three continents and two religions met at that table, sharing the same story of liberation and redemption.

For the past three years, our chavurah has celebrated a second seder together. Thirty or more fill the table. We have begun to write a chavurah Haggadah including each year's seder theme and illustrations from the earliest European Haggadah to the Haggadah for the Beni-Israel of India, reflecting the many lands in which the Haggadah is read.

Our first year, each family took a part of the seder and explained it in their own way. We had a playlet with the appropriate characters of Pesach, Matzah and Maror (who was a real misery); an exploration of the perpetually unsettling curse, "Pour out thy wrath upon the nations;" and an announcement that this night was different because an engagement was announced!

Our second year, we took the themes of liberation and redemption. One member recounted their family's redemption from a North African country in the throes of civil war and anti-Semitic outbreaks. Another drew parallels between Zionism as the national liberation movement of the Jews and the Oka crisis as a symbol of the continuing struggle of native communities to redeem themselves from years of poverty and prejudice. A third participant offered a lighthearted look at the liberation of women from their roles as support services and enablers to full membership in human society.

That the Exodus from slavery to freedom can be told in many languages and experiences. That the familiar story can express the universal longing of mankind for liberation as well as the particular story of one people's liberation. That the telling binds Jews together from all corners of the world, yet gives each person a chance to say how she, or he, was and can be redeemed.

Argentinian emigration a bold move

By Arnold Ages

The idea being pursued by a group of Winnipeg business people to encourage Jews from Argentina to emigrate to that western Canadian city is a bold and innovative one.

A delegation from that city toured Buenos Aires recently and, judging from a recent article in the Jewish Post & News of Winnipeg, the invitation extended to the Jews of Argentina's capital city, was warmly received.

The idea is a natural one for several reasons. From the Canadian perspective, the migration of Argentinian Jews to Winnipeg would help that city's Jewish community maintain the population level that it needs in the face of a daunting demographic loss due to the exodus of some of the Jewish community's younger members. Winnipeg's Jewish population has remained stable over the past decade but it has not experienced any real growth. The influx of a group of highly trained professionals and entrepreneurs from Argentina would greatly enhance the health of the city and its Jewish population.

The Jews of Buenos Aires constitute one of the most dynamic Jewish communities in the world. An identikit of that community, however sketchily drawn, reveals a fiercely Zionist, secularist and Yiddishist collective in which the cultural values of Judaism have been strongly preserved. The community of 175,000 also has a strong Orthodox and Conservative segment and a rabbinical seminary belonging to the latter movement.

In recent decades, the community in Buenos Aires has been buffeted by anti-Semitic agitation. Argentina, as is well known, was also the terminus for Nazi war criminals who fled Europe at the end or World War II.

During the rule of the generals in the 1970s and 1980s, many of the desparecidos the "disappeared ones" — murdered by the then Fascist regime — were Jewish. One prominent Jewish journalist was among those imprisoned on suspicion of Communist activity and he wrote a telling memoir describing the anti-Semitism which his interrogators deployed in their questioning of him. It was during this period that the infamous anti-Semitic slander The Protocols of the Elders of Zion was available in several Buenos Aires bookstores.

With the rise of Iranian and Muslim fundamentalism the Jews of Argentina have encountered a new menace — anti-Jewish terrorism based on a sadly misguided interpretation of Islam. Argentina and neighboring states are the home of hundreds of thousands of Arabs. The zealotry of a small number of fanatical members of that group led, most people think, in the summer of 1994, to a devastating bombing of a huge Jewish communal institution building in Buenos Aires in which a dozen people were murdered and many others injured.

Despite the presence of mounting evidence linking the bombing to fundamentalist groups, the Argentine government to this day has stonewalled so effectively that to this point not a single individual has been charged with this most heinous crime. This was the second such attack: The first in 1992, destroyed the Israeli Embassy in the city and resulted in the death of 30 people. Since those bombings, Jewish community buildings have resembled an armed camp with barricades and security patrols at all times.

In addition to the specific dangers faced by the Jewish community, Argentina itself has been suffering from both political and economic instability — caused in part by the marital problems of its president — and the lowering of tariffs on a wide variety of consumer goods. The Winnipeg delegation was told, for example, that Jewish merchants in the manufacturing trades, have been seriously damaged by the relaxation of customs duties and the entry of retail giants such as Walmart into the Argentine market.

It is unlikely, of course, that the proposed Argentine immigration would involve more than a few hundred people. The Jews of Buenos Aires are not going to abandon a city and a country which, for the last 100 years, has given them unparalleled opportunities of education, employment, culture and commerce. But even the migration of a small number of Buenos Aires Jews to Winnipeg would be a shot in the arm for that city and for Canada as well.

The Arafat speech

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Three weeks ago, I wrote about a speech that Yasser Arafat was reported to have made on Jan. 30 to a group of Arab diplomats assembled in Stockholm, Sweden (CJN, March 14). In this speech, he allegedly made a forecast of Israel's eventual destruction, and did so in the most vivid terms, salted with a generous dose of anti-Semitism ("I have no use for Jews . . . You know how Jews are").

When I first read about it, I was of two minds: not surprised because I continue to suspect Arafat's deeper convictions and have read many of the inflammatory statements he has made to Arab audiences, statements which are frequently hard to reconcile with the peace process; but at the same time surprised, because I do not think Arafat — a cagey political survivor — would throw all caution to the wind. For to have made the alleged speech before as many as 40 people, even if all of them were sworn to secrecy, would have been putting his plans and aspirations at risk. It would take only one person to be indiscreet.

But it now appears highly questionable whether Arafat ever made this speech altogether. If he did not, then I erred by passing it on to my readers, though I was not alone in my inadvertence. Respectable newspapers like the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Times printed it; Barbara Amiel in Maclean's also assumed it to have been said; and even a serious Israeli Newspaper like Ha'aretz published an opinion piece about it.

I have since become aware of the murky path by which the information about the speech is said to have travelled. The best I have been able to ascertain with the help of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) reads something like this: An unnamed individual received the information from an unnamed diplomat who was present. He offered it to Dagen, a reputable Swedish newspaper, but the editor turned down the information for lack of corroboration. It first appeared in the Allgemeiner Journal (New York) — also without clear attribution to a verifiable source. It was then picked up by a small Norwegian Christian paper, also called Dagen, and this coincidence of names led some to believe that it was the Swedish Dagen that had published it.

Meanwhile, Arab sources denied that the speech had been made as reported; Israel's ambassador to the United States, Itamar Rabinowich, also doubted it; and most recently Ha'aretz reversed itself and carried a column by Akiba Eldar in which he suggested that most likely the whole thing was a plant in order to undermine the peace process. The Economist of London appears to take the same view.

To claim that something was said remains rumor if its source is only an anonymous "Deep Throat," an unnamed person whom no one is able to question and who therefore cannot be taken as a serious conduit for so explosive a matter.

However, having said that, I need to add that Arafat remains accountable for his numerous other statements which still await explanation.

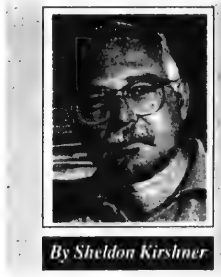
Anti-Semitism: the world's longest hatred



By Sheldon Kirshner

Violent anti-Semitic attacks increased worldwide last year, prompting the president of the World Jewish Congress, Edgar Bronfman, to remark: "It is disturbing to see the incredible resilience of anti-Semitism."

Yes indeed. Anti-Semitism is a recurrent and pathological phenomenon, profoundly rooted in history.

Just how deep it is may surprise some. Preceding Christianity, anti-Semitism surfaced in ancient Greece and Rome, gained impetus with the formation of Christian theology, bled into popular European folklore and reached its apotheosis in this century in supposedly the most advanced of countries, Germany.

Having spread its tentacles to non-Christian societies, anti-Semitism is probably the most persistent societal disease in the universe. It may wax and wane, but it never disappears, as Edgar Bronfman incredulously observed.

Several years ago, the scholar Robert Wistrich produced a sweeping analysis of anti-Semitism, tracing its roots from pagan civilizations to modern times. The book, Anti-Semitism: The Longest Hatred (Pantheon, $15 US), was recently published in a paperback edition.

Wistrich, a professor of history at the University of London and the Hebrew University, deserves praise. Comprehensive yet succinct, Anti-Semitism: The Longest Hatred may well be the finest one-volume treatment of this perennial subject.

Leaving no stone unturned, Wistrich fixes his penetrating gaze on a panoply of topics, ranging from the Crusades and the Spanish Inquisition to the rise of anti-Semitism in Islamic lands.

Three centuries before the Christian era, pagan anti-Semitism surfaced in Hellenistic culture, driven by the desire of the Jews to remain a separate people. Anti-Semitism drew sustenance from resentment that Jews refused to acknowledge the gods of their neighbors, partake in their sacrifices and eat, drink and intermarry with them. Charges that the Jews were exclusivist are found in the writings of Seneca, Juvenal and Cornelius Tacitus.

Popular outbreaks of violence in the first centuries of Christianity resulted in the burning of synagogues. Yet, as Wistrich notes, Jews fared relatively well under Charlemagne and his successors. As the only non-Christian group of any significance permitted to practise their faith in early medieval Europe, they were able to lead a tolerated, though limited, existence.

To Wistrich, the decisive turning point was the First Crusade (1096), which triggered massacres hitherto unprecedented in Jewish-Christian relations. He estimates that in Germany and France one-quarter to one-third of the Jewish population was wiped out in pogroms.

Church doctrine reinforced the animus. The Augustinian credo that "the Jew is the slave of the Christian" had its effect, as did canonical legislation of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215).

Apart from these restrictions, the Talmud came under attack as a symbol of Jewish blasphemy against Christianity. Stereotypes, notably the Jew as a usurer, surfaced. Jews became associated with banking and the parasitical exploitation of the Christian peasantry. In medieval art, Jews were portrayed as agents of Satan. The fantasy of ritual murder, which arose in England, burdened Jews with yet another handicap.

To this, during the Black Plague which ravished Europe between 1347 and 1360, was added one more calumny — that Jews, in their quest to eradicate Christianity, poisoned wells.

Edgar Bronfman

Interestingly enough, the ecclesiastical authorities did not endorse and usually combatted these myths. But the papacy was ambivalent at best with respect to its attitude toward Jews. The church forbade forced baptism and interference with Jewish festivals and desecration of Jewish cemeteries. On the other hand, it supported distinctive dress codes that rendered Jews pariahs and deplored Jewish obstinacy in refusing to acknowledge Jesus as their savior.

As Wistrich reminds us, this blend of limited tolerance and restrictive legislation was ultimately aimed at converting the Jews. Segregation (in the form of ghettos) and repression, it was hoped, would break the back of stubborn Jewish resistance to conversion.

In his discussion of the Inquisition, Wistrich raises an important point. Conversions were widespread in Spain, elevating conversos to prominent positions. But by the 15th century, anti-converso feeling had swelled, fed by a new kind of anti-Semitism which held that Jewish blood was basically tainted. This was the origin of racist anti-Semitism, which reemerged with a vengeance in the 19th century and was appropriated by the Nazis.

Surprising as it may be, the Enlightenment did not spare Jews. The philosophers of that period rejected deicide, but held Jews responsible for crimes and perversities committed in the name of monotheistic religion. Thus, Voltaire repeated the canard that Jews were the "enemies of mankind."

Atheistic radicals, like the Young Hegelian Bruno Bauer, depicted Judaism as a fossilized religion, based on superstition and obscurantism, whose diety was cruel, vengeful and egotistical.

Wistrich notes that the racist trend in anti-Semitism appeared in an age of formal equality when Jews had emerged as dangerous competitors in the liberal professions. Racism had obvious attractions, replacing ghetto walls with immutable biological criteria that the Nazis found irresistible.

A new variant of anti-Semitism, based on anti-capitalism, found its voice in Karl Lueger, the first democratic politician in Europe to triumph on an explicitly anti-Jewish platform. Elected mayor of Vienna in 1897, he provided the first model for Hitler's own war against the Jews.

Wistrich devotes the last third of his book to the relationship between Jews and Muslims. He neither accepts the rosy view that Jews lived under idyllic conditions in the Islamic world nor, at the other extreme, that they were consistently mistreated by Islam.

When tolerance prevailed, Jews registered advances in economic prosperity and even some political influence. But all too often, their lives were punctuated by misery, humiliation and persecution. The litany of violence is recorded on pages 205 to 206. It dwarfs the magnitude of the Holocaust, but is nevertheless instructive.

The Arab-Israeli dispute has exacerbated the incidence of anti-Semitism in the Middle East, particularly among Islamically-inclined Palestinians who support fundamentalist groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad. But anti-Semitism has spilled into every corner of the Arab world, even into places no longer inhabited by Jews.

Regrettably, the world's oldest virus is resistant to all cures.

Sounds of silence

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

One of the powerful monuments of the Torah occurs in this week's Parshat Shemini. However, you can't quote it because nothing was said.

The Torah describes the tragic death of Nadav and Avihu, the two sons of Aaron. Caught in a religious frenzy, they had entered the Tent of Meeting improperly and were consumed by fire, as Aaron, their father stood watching.

Immediately following this tragic moment, Moses said to Aaron, the bereaved Aaron, with his two sons dead in front of him, "This is what HaShem has said: 'I will be made Holy through those who are close to Me.' " Aaron responded with silence.

This moment of Aaron's silence is one of those dramatic moments of the Torah. Faced with the tragic death of his sons, Aaron sat silent. Rashi comments that Aaron was rewarded for his silence. This silence was a great moment.

Aaron's silence can be understood to be the stoic acceptance of Divine justice, the acceptance that the death of his sons was HaShem's doing and whatever HaShem does he will accept.

However, in a broader sense we can learn an important lesson as to the value of silence. Sometimes silence is the most powerful moment. Sometimes nothing is the best thing to say.

For a musician this is certainly true — the proper pause creates tension and anticipation and gives shape to the music. In conversation, silence and the proper pause can sometimes convey the very thing we want to say — I want you to continue to speak, so I will sit silent so you may continue.

When comforting others in their moment of grief or pain, the spoken word is often destructive and detrimental for it tends to trivialize the moment. The Shulchan Aruch in fact states exactly that, in the laws of mourning — the comforter should wait for the mourner to begin to speak and should not began the conversation.

Often the conversations at shivah homes are torturous to the mourner — they have lost a loved one and everyone is talking about such trite and insignificant things.

When lashon hora, negative talk about others, is being spoken, silence will close the conversation. No one wants to talk to themselves; so if we don't participate and say nothing, the conversation will die.

In this week's chapter in Pirkei Avot, Chapter 1, Mishna 17, Rabbi Shimon ben Gamliel emphasizes this point: "My whole life I have grown up amongst chachamim and I never found anything as good for you as silence."

Rabbi Shimon's father was the Nasi, the leader of the Jewish people. The people around Rabbi Shimon were very substantive people. Yet the best thing in his mind was silence. If you listen you hear, if you're talking you aren't listening.

One of the truly powerful moments of the Torah cannot be quoted because it contains no words, only silence. We would do well to learn the lesson of silence.

Shir Lashalom...a national hymn

By DONNIE FRIEDMAN
Special to The CJN

The song Shir Lashalom has evolved through several incarnations. Once an "underground" song, one that was actually banned from Israeli radio for many years, it became an anthem of the Israeli peace movement. Today it is an internationally known eulogy to the memory and vision of Yitzhak Rabin.

On the lips of Rabin before he was gunned down, its words bloodied by the assassin's bullet, the song has achieved a symbolic, almost mystical dimension, and has been elevated to the status of a national hymn.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut correctly pointed out in a recent CJN column that the song is fiercely secular. Prayer is futile, says the songwriter, Yaakov Rothblit. The victims of war are gone and forever buried in the dust. And for the sake of those "whose light is extinguished," as well as for future generations, we must dedicate ourselves to peace. Action for peace, not prayer, not recitations of psalms, the poet implies, is the fittest memorial.

Canadians my be reminded of a similar poem, in which the voices of the dead are also invoked, In Flanders Fields by John McCrae, written in the late days of World War I and recited every year on Remembrance Day. Like the Israeli poet, McCrae calls upon the dead to speak to those left behind.

But legacy of McCrae's fallen soldiers is quite different from that of those invoked by Rothblit. The victims of World War I in McCrae's poem exhort us to "take up our quarrel with the foe." Indeed, unless the living do so, the souls of the dead "shall not sleep, though poppies grow/In Flanders fields."

Shir Lashalom is likewise an elegy, a lament for the dead. In the Hebrew poem, although the sun shines to end the long night, the voices are those of the fallen victims of war. Instead of calling upon us to take up the quarrel, however, their legacy is a call to lay down arms. (Literally: "Lift up your eyes with hope, but not in order to aim through gunsights.")

One can readily understand why this song was once regarded as subversive. Long before the peace process became government policy in Israel, the poet of Shir Lashalom put into the mouths of fallen soldiers and civilians the declaration of a controversial political position. Insensitive? Inflammatory? Or prophetic?

In undertaking a singable English rendition, I was cautioned that it would be wise to soften some of the lines referring to the futility of prayer. Interestingly, Rabbi Plaut, in his column, deplored exactly this sort of distortion of the Hebrew in an existing English translation.

Although the poet would perhaps not share this belief, both prayers and acts are essential to the song for peace.

SHIR LASHALOM

Let the sun shine through the darkness
Brighten up the morn,
Purest words of all your prayers
Can never bring us home.

We whose light will shine no more
Are buried in the dust.
All your bitter cries and tears
Cannot disturb our rest.

Not a soul can bring us back
From deep within the ground,
No hymn can reach us,
Revelry of victories,
Of these we hear no sound.

So let us sing out,
Sing out for peace,
Let prayer turn into song.
It's time to sing out,
Sing out for peace
With voices loud and strong.

Let the sun shine through the blossoms,
By its rays be blessed.
Don't forever look behind us,
Let the fallen rest.

Cast your eyes ahead with hope
And sing forevermore,
Taking aim, with voices raised,
At love instead of war.

Don't just say the day will come,
We've waited far too long,
It's not a dream,
For all our voices fill the squares
And peace is now our song.

Lyrics: Y. Rothblit; Music: Y. Rosenblum; English adaptation: Donnie Friedman (based on a translation by Yitzchak Argamán).

Internet sites help to understand Holocaust

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Zachor. For the survivors of the Holocaust, zachor (remember) has become the universal plea and command to the world not forget those who were destroyed by the Nazis and their accomplices.

Yom Hashoah, the day set aside to remember the destruction of European Jewry, will be observed on Tuesday. Fortunately, there is no shortage of sites on the Internet created to remember and attempt to understand the Holocaust.

Today I will look at Internet sites dealing with the Shoah. I will address the issues of Holocaust denial and modern anti-Semitism in future columns. Understandably, some of these sites have very disturbing text and images. If you have younger children who surf the Web, you may want to explain to them what they are about to see.

The Cybrary of the Holocaust [http://www.best.com:80/~mddunn/cybrary/] is a good starting point.

This large and impressive site looks at all aspects of the Holocaust and includes an education forum where students and teachers worldwide can share their experiences, research and findings. There is also an area for children of survivors and essays on such topics as The Music of the Holocaust.

Many institutions devoted to Holocaust memorial and research have set up their own web sites:

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre and Museum of Tolerance operates a large and well-designed site [http://www.wiesenthal.com/] which looks at prejudice and hatred in general and at the Holocaust in detail.

The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum's Internet site [http://www.ushmm.org/] includes a Brief History of the Holocaust, an essay on Children and the Holocaust and an Annotated Videography on the Shoah.

The Anne Frank House in Amsterdam has a page at [http://www.channels.nl/annefran.html] but Anne Frank Online [http://www.annefrank.com/] is not yet complete. When it is, it promises to be a comprehensive source of information about the young girl who has captivated generations with the diary of her years in hiding.

Perhaps the most famous Holocaust remembrance institution is Yad Vashem [http://yvs.shani.net/] which was established in 1953 by an act of the Israeli Knesset. This modest site takes a brief look at some of Yad Vashem's facilities and displays.

And here in Canada, you can visit both Vancouver's Holocaust Education Centre at [http://hoshi.cic.sfu.ca/~specstate/vhec.html] and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of Toronto [http://www.feduja.org/puzzled/progserv/hrc.stm].

Sometimes more than the written word is needed to help explain the enormity of the Holocaust. Here are some sites that use photographs and art to tell the story of the Shoah.

The Holocaust Pictures Exhibition [http://modb.oce.ulg.ac.be/schmitz/holocaust.html] includes graphic and disturbing photographs which document the atrocities carried out at the extermination camps.

Maurice Mendjisky presents his Homage to the Martyrs of the Warsaw Ghetto at [http://orangeraie.azur.fr/mm1_e.htm]. Mendjisky dedicated his 35 drawings of the Warsaw Ghetto to the memory of his son who was shot by the Nazis in Nice in 1944.

And The Holocaust Album [http://www.hooked.net/users/rgreene/] follows a group of survivors who decided to return to Germany in the summer of 1995.

Much emphasis is being placed on younger generations to remember what happened to their parents and grandparents. The March of the Living is an annual journey where Jewish teenagers from around the world gather in Poland to visit the camps of destruction. Montreal's Steven Fransblow has created a site [http://www.bonder.com/march.html] which includes essays and photographs about the March. By late May, Fransblow promises to add an extensive March of the Living Virtual Tour.

No examination of the Shoah would be complete without acknowledging the heroic efforts of the Righteous Gentiles who risked their own lives to shelter Jews. An essay on what motivated these rescuers is located at [http://www.english.upenn.edu/~afilreis/Holocaust/rescuers-article.html]

And an extensive bibliography of Rescuers During the Holocaust is presented at [http://www.cs.cmu.edu/afs/cs.cmu.edu/user/mmbt/www/rescuers.html].

There are far too many sites dealing with the Holocaust to mention in this column. To see many more links on this subject call up The Ultimate Jewish/Israel Link Launcher at [http://ucsu.colorado.edu/~jsu/cgi-bin/linesearch.cgi]. Then type in the word "holocaust" and press return. You will get a list with about 100 titles.

But in the end, whether there are 100 or 1,000 sites on the Internet devoted to the Holocaust, it is probably impossible to fully understand why an event like the Shoah happened.

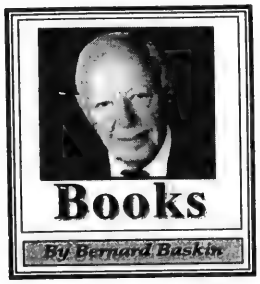
Neo-Nazis' change remarkable



Führer-Ex: Memoirs of a Former Neo-Nazi by Ingo Hasselbach, Random House $33.50

The author of this disturbing book was once the golden hope of the neo-Nazi movement in East Germany. He organized paramilitary camps, coordinated racist attacks against immigrants, desecrated Jewish property and indoctrinated disaffected youth into an international network of right-wing terrorism and Holocaust denial.

But in 1993, after five years of violent and mindless anti-democratic activities, Hasselbach had a change of heart. He recognized "the psychological horror at the heart" of what he was doing and was repelled by the targeting of innocent civilians — especially the fatal fire bombing of immigrants in Northern Germany. He courageously denounced the movement and turned over vital evidence to the authorities. This move resulted in death threats to his family and himself, and the sending of a powerful mail bomb to his mother that, fortunately, failed to detonate.

Hasselbach began his involvement with skinheads as a rebellious and bored teenager, reacting against the restrictions of East German life as well as his disturbed relations with family members.

Among the revelations in the book are the following: Nebraska is the capital of world neo-Nazism; young zealots were trained to go to Bosnia to fight as allies of Croatia.

This book is both an absorbing story of a remarkable personal transformation and an ominous overview of neo-Nazi ideology in contemporary Germany.

This film tells the story of Rhina, a German village with a predominantly Jewish population. When the Nazis came to power the Jewish community vanished. Now the non-Jews of Rhina speak warmly of the old Jewish community. Jews still alive present a different perspective. An emotional confrontation concludes the film.

Orthodox matchmaking service on-line for that perfect catch

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Zelig and Ahava Spillman

TORONTO — Remember the classic song from Fiddler on the Roof: Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match, find me a find, scan your computer files and catch me a catch...

Computers? In Anatevka? What would Tevye the milkman have made of Yenta the matchmaker using Vindas 1895 or Vort-perfect to access her files on eligible bachelors in their tiny shtetl?

The world has certainly changed since Yenta was charged with finding husbands for Tevye's daughters. In those days, relying on her vast network of connections, Yenta might have turned up a tailor's son and perhaps a butcher from the next village (a good catch, always meat on the table).

Today, matchmaking is a different business indeed. Oh, it's still a mitzvah to bring two people together for the purpose of matrimony, but now technology has intruded into that very traditional occupation (or avocation).

One company making use of the new technology is the Orthodox Connection, a matchmaking service that relies on computerized files and Internet hookups to help make you a match or catch you a catch. As a result, the list of eligible partners is going worldwide and the Orthodox Connection has clients in Toronto, Montreal, Antwerp, Australia and South Africa.

Zelig and Ahava Spillman are the husband and wife team behind the three-year-old company. It's their task to interview prospective clients, have them fill out an application form containing biographical data, enter it into their computer system and try and find a suitable mate for each and every one.

"It's tough work," said Zelig.

"A tremendous emotional investment," adds Ahava.

From their database of over 700 clients, they arrange meetings or dates for suitable couples, but even with the help of computer programs that match people with similar backgrounds and values while eliminating others, matters of the heart can still be a hit and miss proposition.

"You can think it's a good shidduch (match) and they can't wait to get away from each other," Zelig said.

One of their success stories involves a 63-year-old man and a woman of 45 living in different cities. He had been "fixed up" previously by the Orthodox Connection and "his date said she'd rather watch paint dry than go out with him again," Ahava recounted.

She suggested they fix him up with the second woman, who was "full of vim and vigor." Zelig looked at her as if she was losing touch with reality, but eventually he agreed and the date was arranged.

"She unlocked his spirit. Now he's active, they go places together, they travel extensively" and they're married, said Ahava, who teaches a course in interpersonal communication at Seneca College.

Though everybody loves a story with a happy ending, Zelig, a former corporate headhunter, won't be specific about the number of successful shidduchs arranged by the Orthodox Connection. It's in double figures, but to say more might place an ayin harah (evil eye) on the venture and doom other couples, he said.

The Orthodox Connection's clients range in age from 18 to 75 and as the name of the firm suggests, they all share a minimum level of religiosity — keeping kosher and observing the Sabbath.

But even among the Orthodox, there's a wide range of observance. Some men don't mind if the woman wears pants, while others want a wife who will shave her hair and wear two head coverings.

The average age of the firm's clients is 38; some are divorced, others never married.

Most are uncomfortable at "Jew Do" gatherings; so the Orthodox Connection brings people together in a more hospitable environment.

Often the couples will meet secretly to avoid unwanted speculation in their communities should the dates not lead to marriage, Zelig said. Their home has become known as "Hotel Spillman," as prospective partners often use it to meet, though many others choose to meet in New York, Ahava said.

The Orthodox Connection recently went on the Internet, the worldwide computer network, with a home page designed by Carey Miller of Call A Ten Year Old, a computer consulting firm.

That Internet connection expands the Orthodox Connection's reach to thousands more eligible Jews and could lead to an expansion of the company's database, making finding the right match more likely, Zelig said.

Ironically, Zelig and Ahava themselves were brought together by mutual friends. Zelig, who was becoming more observant, met Ahava on Rosh Chodesh Nisan and called her back the next day, asking if she'd like to go to a movie the next week and get married on Lag b'Omer. Ahava was taken aback by the proposal and turned it down but agreed to go out with him.

"It took me three days to convince her," Zelig said. They were married on Lag b'Omer 6½ weeks after they first met four years ago.

Their frustration at being single and not finding the right mate helped prompt them to get into the matchmaking business.

Le Bal Masque to aid ICRF in fight against cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Glamor, excitement, fabulous food, mysteries — and all for a great cause. What more can one ask for?

The fourth annual Le Bal Masque will be held April 20 this year at the Arcadian Court in the Simpson Tower. The event is to aid the Israel Cancer Research Fund.

A press release promises a charity casino, a laser show, dancers, a silent auction and, one of the highlights of the evening, the awarding of a prize for the best mask.

Among the items included in the silent auction are trips to Hong Kong, Sandals resort in Jamaica, and Florida; a signed Seinfeld script; spa days; a "be a model for a day" package; a laptop computer; signed baseball bats; and dinners, complete with limos and followed by plays.

Founded in 1975

The Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF), founded in 1975, has as its mission to encourage innovative cancer research by Israeli scientists; to establish a world-class centre for cancer study and to broaden research opportunities within Israel.

It supports research in all of Israel's major institutions and at the ICRF Clinical Cancer Research Centre near Tel Aviv.

Some of the projects funded in the 1994-1995 fiscal year were studies in breast cancer, immune deficiency disease, pediatric oncology, development of new drugs, bone marrow transplantation, tumor suppressor genes and radiation therapy.

During the year, the fund has allocated $1.25 million.

Le Bal Masque netted over $161,000 last year.

Dress is described as "funky black and white, with black tie optional." Tickets are $50 in advance, $60 at the door.

Co-chairs are Sharon Liss, Andrea Obront and Annette Wine. For more information or tickets, call the Israel Cancer Research Fund offices, 416-487-5246.

Adoption: What does Halachah say?

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

"Whoever rears an orphan in his house is considered as if he had begotten that child." — Talmud, Sanhedrin 19b.

What does Halachah say about adoption? Plenty. The Talmud and other sources expound at length on the myriad of issues surrounding the raising of Jewish and non-Jewish children who are not one's own.

Special Report

As with everything else in Jewish life, rabbis through the ages have arrived at various interpretations, but there is surprising uniformity in thought, even among the different branches of Judaism. Questions sometimes arise, however, on how, or even whether, to convert a child.

Because it is a modern concept, the Talmud does not discuss legal adoption as we know it. Jewish law has no equivalent to today's civil adoptions, which require adoptive parents to assume all rights and responsibilities toward the child and become the legal parents in every way. In fact, there is no word in biblical Hebrew for adoption. In modern Hebrew, the word is imutz, which derives from ametz, meaning "strengthen," and probably taken from a reference in Psalm 80 to a branch being transplanted and "made strong."

Nevertheless, biblical Judaism had a positive view of raising another's child. Moses himself was adopted and his adoptive mother, Bithia, daughter of the Pharaoh, is praised by the sages. Ruth's child was also called Naomi's, because he was reared by Naomi. Mordechai was said to have "adopted" Esther. Michal, King David's childless wife, raised her sister's sons and was considered their mother. Other midrashim reinforce the view that adoption is a great mitzvah.

But civil adoption does not change a child's status in Jewish law. A non-Jewish child maintains its biological identity until he or she is converted.

Jewish law regarding adoption centres on whether the child was born to a Jewish mother. But according to Rabbi Michael Gold, author of And Hannah Wept, a groundbreaking study of infertility and adoption among Jews, some Orthodox couples will avoid adopting a baby born to a Jewish mother. The child could be the result of adultery or incest and therefore a mamzer. (A baby born out of wedlock is not necessarily a mamzer, but there are different categories of mamzerim, who cannot marry Jews of legitimate birth.)

Some rabbis say there is a presumption of legitimacy when the mother is Jewish. If the birth mother is Jewish and married, they assume the child was sired by the husband. If she is unmarried, they assume the natural father was not of a category that would make the child a mamzer. These rabbis contend there should only be concern about mamzerut when there is direct evidence of it. Other rabbis believe there is no presumption of legitimacy.

In any event, the majority of modern adoptions deal with non-Jewish children. And if a child's religion is not known, it should be assumed he is not Jewish.

If the child is a newborn boy, he should be circumcised (although secular counsellors strongly suggest waiting until the end of the legal consent period in case the birth mother should change her mind). Older boys should also be circumcised. Boys already circumcised should undergo the hatafat dam brit (the drop of blood of the Covenant) ceremony.

Orthodox and Conservative Judaism require that both boys and girls undergo total immersion in a mikvah (tevilah) to symbolize rebirth. Many Reform congregations consider tevilah optional and believe that simply giving the child a Hebrew name and Jewish education is sufficient for conversion. Immersion is to be performed before a beit din (religious court) of three rabbis. The special blessing for converts is said and the child receives a Hebrew name.

Being Jewish a 'z'chut'

Most sources agree a correctly converted child is treated by Halachah the same as a biological child, while some believe adoption does not quite constitute a fully natural relationship between parent and child. Traditional views hold that if an adoptive father is a kohen or a levi, it does not make the adopted child one. They add that when an adoptive parent dies, the adopted child should observe shivah and recite Kaddish, but is not subject to all the regulations governing mourning by a child for his natural parents.

Most sources concur that an adopted infant may be named after a deceased relative of the adoptive parents. If a boy is a first child of his biological Jewish mother and neither natural parent is a kohen or levi, he should have a pidyon haben, regardless of whether the adoptive parents have other children or are descendants of kohanim or levi'im. A converted girl cannot marry a kohen.

Many rabbis allow a child receiving a Hebrew name to be called the son or daughter of the adoptive father, but want the word hamegadlo (who raised him) added after the adoptive father's name on conversion documents and when a child is called to the Torah, to avoid future problems on marriage and divorce papers.

Some Orthodox rabbis, however, say an adopted child must be called ben Avraham Avinu, the son of Abraham our father (for girls, bat Avraham Avinu.)

Sages, however, have posed the serious question of whether anyone — even an adoptive parent — has the right to convert a non-Jewish child and raise it as a Jew without its input.

There are medieval and even Talmudic sources which suggest a child may only be converted to Judaism when its biological parents bring it along for conversion, or that there must be some consent from gentile biological parents. Other authorities state a child must be mature and intelligent enough to decide for itself.

But generally, all streams of Judaism operate on the Talmudic dictum that to be a Jew is a z'chut (privilege), and "we can act to a person's advantage without his express permission." (Ketubot 11a). Thus, a minor's consent is not necessary.

The late Rabbi Gedalia Felder of Toronto wrote that the very act of putting a child up for adoption is proof that the biological parents are doing what is best for the child, and this is tacit enough permission to convert it.

Some rabbis say the ideal halachic approach would be to convert the child just prior to his or her bar or bat mitzvah, but this too raises concerns. For until the actual conversion, the child is a non-Jew, and that causes additional tensions in a family. Postponing conversion might become an impediment to the proper integration of the adopted child into its Jewish family and community. Thus, according to the Union for Traditional Judaism's panel of halachic inquiry, most rabbis favor converting a child in infancy.

On the other hand, Rabbi Melech Schachter, a Yeshiva University authority on the subject, notes that many Jewish couples who adopt are not fully observant. Adopted children may then violate the Sabbath, disregard kashrut and ignore Torah. Can this kind of Judaism be a z'chut?

Rabbi Schachter responds: "The way conditions are today, it is by far a greater z'chut to remain a non-Jew than to become a Jew and violate every commandment."

No matter what kind of conversion there was, the Talmud states a child may "protest" it upon reaching the age of consent (12 for girls, 13 for boys). In modern terms, that means an adopted child has the right to retroactively nullify its conversion. But a child who grows up in a loving Jewish home and receives a Jewish education will probably choose to remain Jewish.

Most rabbis regard the bar or bat mitzvah ceremony as a reaffirmation of the conversion. Others say a child must reaffirm its conversion prior to the ceremony. But beware: the Talmud states that should a child not cancel its conversion at the right time, he or she may never do it again.

Should a child be told he or she was adopted? Tradition says yes — in Orthodoxy because a child should know his or her true status for purposes of marriage and divorce. The Talmud notes that a convert is like a new person without relatives, but that does not release the adopted child from taking great care not to marry a possible close natural relative, even going so far as to refuse to marry another adoptee.

The best advice is the simplest: Consult your rabbi.

Agencies to call

Batshaw Youth and Family Services: A public agency for Jewish families in Quebec seeking to adopt locally. Works with the Secrétariat à l'adoption internationale du Québec, a government body that oversees the adoption of children from outside Quebec, including the rest of Canada. 514-695-5251.

Société Formons Une Famille Inc.: Certified by the Quebec government, this non-profit group founded in 1991, specializes in foreign adoptions and has facilitated the adoptions of about 1,200 children from China. Provides detailed breakdown of costs and required paperwork. 514-252-1465; 416-755-7310.

Adoption Council of Ontario: Founded in 1987, features extensive support for adoptees, adoptive parents and birth parents. Provides information hotline, public education, advocacy and resources. 416-482-0021.

Canadian Homes for Russian Children: Founded in 1993, has matched two dozen children from Russia with Canadian couples. Works with a team in Russia. Most children are not Jewish. Average wait is eight months or less. Half of all placements involve siblings. 416-667-7666.

Families for Children Inc.: Founded in 1972, has facilitated the adoptions of over 2,000 children from El Salvador, Somalia and other countries. Currently specializing in India. 416-967-7148.

Jewish Family and Child Service: Toronto Jewish community's central social service provider. Waiting lists for children can reach seven years and more. Most children it places are "special needs," but that definition includes any child over one year. 416-638-7800.

LAFF: (Latin American Adoptive Families). A support group for parents who have adopted or are considering adoption in South and Central American countries. Has 250 family members across Canada. 416-461-7988.

Partners in Inter-Country Adoption Inc.: Helps Canadian couples adopt institutionalized Romanian children. Run by volunteers with direct experience in adoption in Romania. P.O. Box 46072, College Park Post Office, 444 Yonge St., Toronto, Ont., M5B 2L8.

Children's Bridge: Founded by Linda Welsh in 1991 after she adopted a girl from China. Has facilitated in some 140 Chinese adoptions. Average waiting period is nine months. Provides solid support and counselling. 613-225-4003.

Family Outreach International: Also specializes in Chinese adoptions. Provides information on financial requirements and help with documents. 613-789-8677.

Jewish Family Service Agency: Vancouver Jewry's social service provider. 604-257-5151. The B.C. government also has an Adoption Programs service, which can answer questions about its progressive new Adoption Act. 604-387-3660.

Jewish Children's Adoption Network: The goal of this Denver-based matchmaking group is to keep Jewish children in Jewish homes. Receives referrals of up to 200 Jewish children a year from rabbis, social workers, lawyers and birth mothers. Maintains a list of over 1,000 Jewish families seeking to adopt. 303-573-8113.

Stars of David: Founded 10 years ago, based in Northbrook, Ill., provides Jewish couples with information on every aspect of adoption, including conversion, baby-naming, post-adoption problems and special-needs children. Has some 1,000 members in 30 chapters in the United States, but does deal with Canadians. 708-509-9929.

All provincial governments provide information on adoption, lists of licensed practitioners (where applicable) and updates on rules and regulations on foreign adoption. Details may be obtained through the family or social services ministry in your province. — R.C.

two heritages."

Cohen puts it in perspective: The lighter the child's skin color, the fewer problems he and his new parents will face in a white society.

Parents and children struggling with identity and other issues may consider rabbinic counselling or turning to a number of organizations which offer a full range of support services for adoptive families, such as the Illinois-based Stars of David.

Sheli Braun is trying to start a Canadian arm of the Jewish Children's Adoption Network, a Denver-based matchmaking organization that tries to keep Jewish children in Jewish homes. Revenue Canada has turned down her request for charitable registration, but she has reapplied.

The Chinese Route

International adoptions proceed much faster than private ones and certainly anything at public agencies, where waiting lists can be years long. The best information is usually obtained through provincial social service ministries, which supply updated lists of dozens of countries and their legal requirements.

Today, China seems the hottest market. Cohen estimates that between 800 and 1,000 Chinese babies are being adopted by Canadian couples every year. The reason is availability. China's one-child policy is strictly enforced (at least in urban areas) and boys are prized. Thus, Chinese orphanages are brimming with baby girls given up by parents who keep trying for a boy.

A Chinese adoption usually costs between $12,000 and $16,000. That includes the required notarized home study, travel costs, expenses, legal and translation fees and a hefty "donation" (up to $3,000 US) to a Chinese orphanage. According to China's adoption laws, any married couple 35 years old and older, without any children, may adopt. There are some exceptions for younger couples. Couples in a common law relationship may not adopt.

The paperwork may seem overwhelming but the average period to complete an adoption from China is just nine months.

Experts agree that couples need not worry about baby-buying in China. Because the country is so highly regulated and orphanages are state-run, there is "little or no bribery and corruption," says Linda Welsh of Ottawa, founder of Children's Bridge, which helps couples adopt from China. "Everything is above board."

Goldblatt notes that couples should question a foreign adoption that costs $25,000 or more. "It simply does not cost that much. If it does, there are a lot of people being bought off along the way."

All provincial laws are clear that no one may give or receive any payment in connection with an adoption. But in another country, different rules apply and Canadian couples have no control over whether the birth mother is paid. Besides, there are no records of a Canadian adoption being rescinded because of shady practices in another country.

Recently, international adoptions have come under suspicion in Guatemala, Paraguay, El Salvador, India, Ukraine and Georgia.

And then there are health concerns. Couples are advised to be extra careful in Russia, where Fetal Alcohol Syndrome is widespread. Adoption researcher Cohen says couples should watch out for any contagious disease, including hepatitis and tuberculosis, as well as AIDS, especially in Romania.

The best rule of thumb is that the poorer the host country, the more likely there will be corruption and selling of babies, Cohen adds. "If money went to the birth mother, that would be good. But the middleman gets the money. Usually, birth mothers get very little."

Once an adopted child is safely back in this country, Cohen advises couples to do two things: adopt the child in Canada using Canadian lawyers and courts and make the child a Canadian citizen, as adoption does not always confer citizenship.

Another good idea is to get to know the host region's laws on the time period in which a birth mother can change her mind. In some U.S. states, she can change her mind six months after the child is born.

In four Canadian provinces, foreign adoptions are about to become a lot easier. Last year, Ottawa signed, but has yet to ratify, the Hague Convention governing intercountry adoptions, which will bring Canada in line with 65 other nations to promote the best interests of children.

So far, just four provinces have amended their laws to conform to the coming change: British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. That means anyone pursuing an out-of-country adoption in those provinces will have their choice between a central government agency and private agencies or practitioners; couples in other provinces (except Quebec) will have to continue using private agencies and licensed individuals.

The nuts and bolts are many and, at times, confusing. But in the end, Jewish couples may turn to the Talmud, which brings it all into sharp focus when it says that the "real" parents of a child are those who raise and nurture it.

Passover products pulled in Quebec

"It really showed some insensitivity," he said.

Sultan also voiced skepticism over the OFL's assertion that the 10 complaints it received included those from members of the Sephardi community.

Sultan, who is Sephardi, ventured that while it's possible a small number of Sephardi Jews complained, it's more likely the office "is trying to play with us," seeking to create divisions within the Jewish community on language issues.

"Anything can happen, but the Sephardi community benefits from the same products," he said.

To support his suspicion that the OFL may have been bent on proving a point this year, Sultan produced a letter the office sent just two weeks before Passover to Rejeanne Raymond, head of the francisization department of Hudon et Deaudelein Ltee, Provigo's head office.The letter urges that Raymond "act rapidly since kosher products are on the shelves for only a limited amount of time.

"It is not only a question of removing these products," the letter states. "It is also necessary that you receive a confirmation from your [kosher] suppliers that they will francisize their labels in order to prevent this infraction from being repeated in future years."

The issue of kosher-food labelling is complex since there are two jurisdictions involved.

Requirements for bilingual food-labelling apply across Canada and fall under the federal agriculture department's Food & Drug Law, for which non-French imported kosher goods have been treated as "food of origin" exemptions.

Quebec language legislation, however, also controls food labelling insofar as it is part of the area covered by the French language charter.

Further complicating the issue are longstanding complaints by local kosher food importers requiring them to slap French-ingredient labels onto imported English-only kosher goods made available year-round.

Sultan said CJC-Q would be asking the OFL to allow Article 5 (c) to be applied year-round, but not to enforce the part prohibiting English-only imports if an "equivalent" product is already available with French-labelling.

״איש מביט בִּבְנוֹ,

ורואֶה בעֵינוֹ את מה שהיה

ומה שהינוֹ ומה שיהיה כשהוא

עצמו כבר אינוֹ,

וכל המַּרְאֶה הזה איך בָּבָה

כמו בְּמַפַּת רעם

ומי יָמוּד את יגונו״.

בנו של נתן יונתן, ליאור, נפל במלחמת יום הכיפורים, ומאז עולה זכרו ברבים משיריו של נתן לאורך עשרים השנים האחרונות. ובימים אלה, כשכל-כך הרבה ישראלים מאבדים את חייהם על מזבח הטרור, וכל-כך הרבה הורים קוברים את ילדיהם - מקבלת כותרת הספר ״רעול פנים הזמן״ משמעות כואבת עוד יותר.

מכתב מליליאן:

וַנְיָנְיֶקָא, סבּרואר 1996:

הטלפון מעיר אותי בחשיכה. איפה אני הלילה? בקויבק סיטי?- לא, זה היה שבוע שעבר! בפלורידה? לא, זה בעוד שבועיים! אחר כך אני מתאפס ונזכר שאני הלילה בווינִיפֶג. קומה עשרים ושלוש במלון. טיסה שביעית בחודשיים האחרונים. בחוץ מינוס שבעים ושלוש. כל ״הבחוץ״ שלי מסתכם בדרך מן הלובי למונית, ומן המונית לדלת הזכוכית של שדה התעופה. שאר הזמן - באקווריום. כל המקומות נראים כמעט אותו הדבר. ההרצאות שאני נותן גם הן די חוזרות על עצמן. טוב, אני מגזים, אני פוגש אנשים חכמים ומאוד מעניינים, ולומד מהם הרבה - מהעבודה שלהם, מהנסיון שלהם, ולפעמים אפילו מן הדרך שבה הם שואלים שאלות. פתאום אני מבין שהעבר הרחוק שלי בתחום הבידור, הנסיעות התכופות עם אמנים מעיר לעיר ומארץ לארץ הביאו אותי גם למסע הזה אל עולם המדע. ומדוע אני מספר לכם את זה? שתדעו שאין לכם מה לחפש בווינִיפֶג בפברואר, אפילו אם מציעים לכם כרטיס בחינם. תישארו בבית.

מַשְׁאֲלָה לְפֶסַח:

שיִפֶסַח אלוקים על בתי בני ישראל כמו שעשה פעם, ושיעברו על כולנו ימים שקטים יותר, אפילו משעממים.

CJC-P maintains fight against anti-Semitism

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Bill Yee, president of the Chinese Benevolent Association of Vancouver, presented a $2,000 cheque to Dr. Michael Elterman, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region (CJC-P), at a recent event marking International Day for the Elimination of Racism.

Canadian Jewish Congress "remains vigilant in pursuing its mandate to combat anti-Semitism and racism and promote understanding among all groups, and to advocate on behalf of the advancement of equality and human rights across Canada," Elterman said at the event organized by the Committee for Racial Justice, an umbrella group of community, labor and service organizations.

Elterman said Congress has been assured of continued moral and financial support to help fight its complaint to the B.C. Human Rights Council against controversial columnist Doug Collins and the paper he writes for, North Shore Free Press Ltd.

A complaint was filed last year but has not yet been acted on by the council.

Elterman praised changes in the B.C. Human Rights Act which allow for complaints of discriminatory practices which are likely to expose a person or group of persons to hatred and contempt. But he said complainants need adequate resources and trained staff with expertise and knowledge.

It is Congress' opinion, Elterman said, that "because of the sensitivity and subtlety of the issues involved, the complainant must have the ability to prosecute discriminatory minority claims by having access to legal counsel without being burdened by costs personally."

As CJC-P has launched the first complaint under a new section of the Human Rights Act, "we are cognizant of the possibility of a constitutional challenge by the respondents [Collins and the newspaper]."

The outcome of the case "will impact on both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities," said Elterman in explaining the need for a legal defence fund.

"It is gratifying that other community groups join with Congress in believing that Human Rights legislation is one of the most vitally important guarantees of equality and dignity to all persons and therefore must be clear and broad enough to be successfully enforced."

JCFS project aimed at mental health problems

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Child and Family Service (JCFS) has recently launched a two-year project aimed at helping people in the Jewish community who have mental health problems.

The project, funded by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Winnipeg Foundation, is designed to help individuals who need special assistance to function more independently in the community.

The JCFS has hired social worker and nurse Faye Ostrove to work on the project. Ostrove has had 12 years of nursing experience in the mental health field, including a stint in the Health Sciences Centre Department of Psychiatry.

"We have identified about 40 people in our community who can use this service," says Barney Yellen, the JCFS executive director, "but we have decided to cap Faye's caseload at 20, while we try to determine how effective the program can be."

The project, which was developed over the past year with help from the Canadian Mental Health Association, will be thoroughly evaluated at the end of the first and second year. If successful, it will become a permanent JCFS service with funding provided from the Jewish community.

BBYO DANCE-A-THON

BBYO recently held their seventh annual fundraiser Dance-A-Thon "Tonight's The Night" at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. The evening kicked off with a community dance where 250 youth came out to participate. The dance wrapped up at midnight and 75 BBYOers stayed to dance the night away. Winners for the highest donation were awarded to Robb Maizen from Kingston, Naomi Hoffenberg and David Noon from Toronto and Micah Potechin from Ottawa. Neil Orlowsky (left) and Annie Ross (right) were the youth coordinators of the event.

Now! Health insurance for your appliances. Why take chances?

For 12 years, Southern Atlantic Appliance Service has been providing a unique form of insurance to both home and condominium owners in Ontario. Robert and Errol Gordon founded the company in April of 1984, basing their idea on one which had been very successful in Florida for many years: a single insurance package for all makes and models of appliances. Until the father and son opened their business, no company in Toronto was offering such a package.

The Southern Atlantic Appliance Service Protection Plan works like other kinds of insurance. You avoid major repair bills and assure yourself of fast, dependable service by factory-trained technicians at no additional cost to you. For as little as $99 a year for 5 major appliances, or pennies a day, you can protect yourself against the high cost of repairs.

The Southern Atlantic Appliance Protection Plan covers all parts and labour required for maintaining the insured appliances in good operating condition. There is no limit to the number of repairs; and there are no charges for trips or pick-ups. You are guaranteed service within 24 hours of your call. Often, however, a technician will visit you on the same day.

Southern Atlantic technicians service any brand or model of appliance, so that no matter what makes you own, the one call to Southern is the only one you need to make. Southern Atlantic has also been authorized by Sub Zero, Thermador and other manufacturers to do warranty service. The company's technicians regularly attend schooling seminars in order to keep up with new technology in the appliance industry, and maintain their skills and efficiency at a high level. For non-members, Southern will make C.O.D. calls.

During the last few years, Southern Atlantic has expanded it's business to meet the needs of both their clients and the public by carrying a full line of top quality water filters for those concerned with maintaining the purity of their drinking water.

Southern Atlantic Appliance Service is a 100% Canadian-owned company, and member of the Better Business Bureau. In order to apply for your "Easy Peace of Mind" Protection Plan, don't hesitate to call: (905) 738-4076.

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957. For many women, owning a fur coat provides them with a feeling of warmth, and comfort and requires special care in order to maintain its natural characteristics.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every 2 years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15% off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, as well as Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality shearling lambs and fur lined Microfibres round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

Jewish Singles join Registry - in record numbers

It has happened to all of us. A well-meaning friend or relative sets you up on a blind date with someone who is "absolutely perfect for you." You arrange to meet, take the time to get ready and on the way over you allow yourself to think - for just a moment - that maybe this might be the one. But a few minutes after meeting your date you realize that the person is nothing like your friend described, that you have nothing in common, and that you'd have been better off spending the night at home. It's disappointing, frustrating - and it doesn't have to be that way!

Information is key

The whole premise behind the Jewish Singles Registry is to provide registrants with the information necessary to make informed and quality dating choices. Members get to view very detailed and comprehensive biography profiles on each other. Personality traits, hobbies, interests, community involvement, and even the reasons for joining the service, make up just a portion of the questionnaire. A photograph attached to each file completes the "picture". Members have been joining in record numbers, and the selection of compatible biographies has never geen greater.

Confidentiality top priority

With all the information provided, the Registry prides itself on providing a top quality, confidential service. A first name and private code number allows Registry staff to process members' requests in an efficient and confidential manner. No last names or addresses are ever disclosed, and phone numbers are only exchanged with the consent of both individuals.

Network of Cities

The Jewish Singles Registry network of cities includes Montreal, Toronto, and Ottawa. The close proximity between the 3 cities allows Registry members the opportunity to connect with other Jewish singles they would not otherwise meet. Many successful marriages have resulted because of this network, and with new members signing up on practically a daily basis, the chances of finding someone suitable has never been better.

See how they operate

If you have never been to a dating service before here is the perfect opportunity to do so. The Montreal office will be holding an open-house on Thursday, April 25 from 2-9 p.m. at 120A Côte St. Antoine. Join them for coffee and information. This is your opportunity to be pro-active, by taking matters into your own hands, and grabbing control of your love life. A Toronto open house is scheduled for May.

With summer just around the corner, there is no better time to take the initiative and find that relationship that you've been seeking. Whether you are looking to meet someone for friendship, a relationship, or marriage, the time is right to sign up with the Jewish Singles Registry. Montreal 514-937-2049, Toronto 416-398-7068, Ottawa 613-591-6544.

Excitement on Bayview! Beth Tikvah unveils new catering concept

Toronto can now experience an exciting new trend in kosher catering. It's all about choice, quality and value.

On April 1st, Beth Tikvah Synagogue entered into an arrangement with four high quality, well experienced kosher caterers. They are: GMB Culinary Productions in association with Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers; Levy's Catering; Malmar Fine Foods and Catering; and Peter Graben Fine Foods Limited.

The new format means that those planning an event will have a great many choices both in style of service and value range.

This innovative "open kitchen" concept is a first for Torontonians wishing to plan a kosher simcha, and we are proud that Beth Tikvah is leading the way.

At the recent synagogue launch of the "open kitchen" concept, Beverley Holtzman, Catering Chair for Beth Tikvah stated, "We hope the wide variety of choices available will lead people to consider the Beth Tikvah option when planning in-synagogue functions."

"Celebrating an important life cycle event in the synagogue brings to mind all the reminiscences and history of our traditions," explains Rabbi Wayne Allen, Beth Tikvah's spiritual leader.

Beth Tikvah Synagogue offers banquet halls capable of seating up to 500 guests, free parking and coat checking. It is easily reached by car or public transit, and is handicapped accessible. Good booking dates are still available for 1996 weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs and organizational functions.

In addition to the main sanctuary, Beth Tikvah's chapel is ideal for the smaller wedding, baby naming, brit milah and aufruf.

"This project was months in preparation," says Holtzman. "We gathered a committee whose members personify a diverse cross section of the Synagogue. There was representation from different ages and lifestyles, as well as input from foodservice professionals. Kosher caterers from across the city were invited to apply. Our very active catering committee then selected, based on a list of criteria and tasting presentations, the four fine caterers they felt would best service our clients' needs. Beth Tikvah Synagogue and all four caterers are glatt kosher under the supervision of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth of Toronto (COR)."

In order to showcase our facilities, Beth Tikvah Synagogue will hold a "Simcha Fair" on Wednesday, May 22, 7-10 p.m. In addition to our caterers, participants will include other simcha related service specialists such as florists, photographers, videographers, bands, invitation designers, party planners, bridal consultants and wine distributors. For further information please call 416-221-3433, ext. 313.

Referendum plan angers Palestinians, Likud

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Shimon Peres' proposal to hold a national referendum before signing a permanent agreement with the Palestinians has drawn sharp criticism from the Israeli right and from the Palestinian Authority.

Peres' surprise announcement last week marked the first time an Israeli leader has offered to bring the question of the final-status negotiations with the Palestinians before the Israeli people.

It also parallels Peres' promise to hold a referendum before signing a peace agreement with Syria.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Peres' opponent in the May 29 national elections, immediately condemned the declaration.

"I am puzzled by the attempts by Mr. Peres to bypass the real referendum," Netanyahu told Army Radio. "The real referendum is the elections."

Likud Knesset member Uzi Landau charged Peres with attempting to avoid giving the Israeli public a clear picture of his peace policies before the elections.

"What Peres wishes is to have a blank cheque to run with whatever policy he would like to push forward, but not tell the public in Israel what he has on his mind," Landau told Israel Radio.

Palestinian leaders also criticized the idea, saying that it represented a bad-faith negotiating posture.

"It completely goes against everything that was agreed upon" in earlier accords with the Jewish state, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat told reporters in the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian Authority official Freih Abu Medein described the idea as a "death blow" to the peace process.

Peres later told reporters in the Persian Gulf nation of Qatar, during a state visit there, that he was surprised at the Palestinian reaction.

"There was no agreement with the Palestinians on how we would ratify the accord," he said. "We did not promise them that it would be done in Parliament."

Peres first raised the issue of a referendum last week, during a flight to the Persian Gulf state of Oman.

He told reporters he would seek the mandate of his Labor party to negotiate a permanent settlement with the Palestinians, and then take the agreement to the Israeli people for ratification through a referendum.

The final-status negotiations with the Palestinians on such issues as Jerusalem, borders and the fate of Jewish settlements are scheduled to begin in May.

Israeli officials have said the talks would likely start on time, but that substantive issues would not be addressed until after the Israeli elections.

Peres' proposal came as both the Likud and Labor parties have launched election campaigns promising Israelis peace with security.

This refrain has a timely ring for Israelis, shaken over the past few months by a string of suicide bombings that killed 58 victims in 10 days, a sudden jolt after a relatively quiet seven months.

The Hamas fundamentalist group that carried out the bombings vowed last Tuesday to renew suicide attacks against Israel.

Peres made the referendum proposal in the wake of charges by Likud that he was reaching secret bargains with the Palestinian leadership.

The Likud launched its election campaign earlier this year with the slogan, "Peres Will Divide Jerusalem," a claim the prime minister has denied.

Meanwhile, Labor party officials were supportive of the referendum proposal. Peres called for the referendum "in order to give a hint to the people of the State of Israel that every final decision will be taken by the people of the State of Israel in a democratic way," said Hagai Meirom, chair of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee.

In New York, Tourism Minister Uzi Baram said such an initiative would be a useful way "to calm down Israeli public opinion.

"I think Peres can get approval," said Baram, a longtime vocal dove who was the top vote-getter in last month's Labor party primaries, second only to Peres,

But, Baram added, if the measure did fail at the polls, the government "would have to call for new elections."

Before a media briefing in New York on the resilience of Israeli tourism in the face of recent terror attacks, Baram brushed aside a question about the possible repercussions of surprising Arafat, who has termed the idea a violation of the Israeli-Palestinian accords.

Baram did say, however, that he believed the "problem of the closure" of the West Bank and Gaza Strip after the series of Hamas bombings "creates a very complicated situation for Arafat," which, in turn, could affect Peres.

Peres has made the continuation of the peace process contingent upon a timely revocation of the portions of the Palestine National Covenant calling for Israel's destruction.

But that revocation, which must pass the Palestine National Council by a two-thirds vote, is looking less and less certain as resentment is building over the security crackdown and resulting shortages of basic supplies.

Hamas threatens more bombings

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – After a month long lull in the terror attacks that shook Israel, two Islamic militant groups have threatened to resume their suicide bombing missions.

The Izzedine al-Kassam Brigade, the armed wing of Hamas, said in a leaflet distributed last Tuesday to news agencies here that it was "not going to give up and is going to punish everyone who declared war against Hamas."

The threat, which came on the eve of the Passover holiday, was issued a day after a smaller fundamentalist group, Islamic Jihad, promised new suicide attacks against the Jewish state.

The groups claimed responsibility for four suicide attacks against Israel in late February and early March that claimed the lives of 58 victims.

In their leaflet, the Hamas group referred to their suicide attacks as "the wonderful martyrdom operations."

Syrian talks, Lebanese tension

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

It is a truism that political developments in the Middle East are often inextricably intertwined. Israel's recent decision to suspend its on-again, off-again peace talks with Syria against the backdrop of renewed tension in southern Lebanon is a prime example of how one event impinges or influences another.

Mideast Analysis

Israel called off its negotiations with Syria early last month, citing two factors: Syria's failure to condemn the latest wave of Hamas and Islamic Jihad suicide bombings which claimed the lives of 58 people in nine horrifying days, and Syria's tolerance of a spate of Hezbollah attacks in southern Lebanon in which six Israeli soldiers were killed.

Since then, Israel has upped the ante. Foreign Minister Ehud Barak has said he expects "a clear condemnation" from Syria of the suicide bombings before talks on the future of the Golan Heights are resumed. Taking things one step further, Prime Minister Shimon Peres has declared that Syria will have to rein in Hezbollah for the negotiations to proceed any further.

Israel's position seems reasonable, but is it realistic? Have the Israelis painted themselves into a corner? Or is Israel's stance related to the May 29 general election?

The Syrian government, for reasons best known to itself, has never officially condemned Arab terrorism directed at Israel. Indeed, Syria boycotted last month's anti-terrorism conference in Sharm El-Sheik, and remains on a U.S. list of nations supporting terrorism.

Syria, while opposed in principle to Islamic militancy, regards Hezbollah as a legitimate national liberation movement and supports Hezbollah's quest to remove Israeli forces from its protectorate in Lebanon. Rightly or wrongly, the Syrians view Hezbollah as surrogates with the military capability of pressuring Israel to ease its demands with respect to the final disposition of the Golan Heights.

Syria, therefore, has not opposed Hezbollah's freshest offensive in Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon. Israel, not for the first time, has urged Syria to restrain Hezbollah. But the Syrians have not lifted a finger, despite the Syrian foreign minister's assurance, stated last December, that Damascus opposes an escalation of fighting in southern Lebanon.

Hafez Assad uses Hezbollah to pressure Israel

If anything, Syria — the final arbiter of Lebanese politics — is continuing with its policy of letting Hezbollah ship supplies from Iran through routes in Lebanon. The spiritual leader of Hezbollah, Hassan Nasrallah, has confirmed this in an interview with a London-based Arabic weekly. Syria, he said, provides Hezbollah with "a political cover, moral support and field facilities."

In all likelihood, Hafez al-Assad will not abandon this policy unless Syria and Israel reach an agreement over the Golan. The two sides, however, are still relatively far apart on the key issues: security arrangements, water supplies, the depth and timing of an Israeli withdrawal, and the degree of normalization.

In the absence of any such diplomatic breakthroughs, Syria will be loath to take steps to curb Hezbollah's operations against Israel and its Arab surrogate, the South Lebanon Army, led by Antoine Lahad. These attacks range from roadside bombings to frontal assaults.

Since the beginning of this year, there have been more than 100 incidents in the security zone, Israel's last active war front. Hezbollah — which carried out more than 600 operations in Lebanon in 1995 — has also fired rockets into northern Israel, causing property damage.

Israel, which lost 23 soldiers in Lebanon last year, has warned Hezbollah that its patience is wearing thin. Ezer Weizman, the president of Israel, said recently that "the matter will be dealt with."

Is Israel contemplating a massive raid on Hezbollah bases? Peres has ruled out a major response on the scale of Operation Accountability in 1993. Yet he has said that Israel will not be bound by a policy of restraint, which has been the case so far.

In large part, Israel has held back because it realizes that Hezbollah has the means to inflict serious blows on settlements in the northern Galilee. Besides, as Israel has learned through painful experiences in the 1970s and 1980s, there is no military solution to the problem in southern Lebanon. It is, first and foremost, a political matter.

Even if Syria cracks down on Hezbollah, Iran — Syria's ally — may well step into the breach. Iran, which backs Hamas and Islamic Jihad, is ardently pro-Hezbollah. Late last month, in an unprecedented statement, Iran's embassy in Beirut warned Israel not to take action against Iranian interests in Lebanon.

Israel, however, will likely ignore this warning should it decide to strike hard at Hezbollah.

The News In Brief

Arafat: Israel Has Declared War On Us

JERUSALEM – "Israel has declared war on the Palestinian people," Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat said Monday, April 1, in a letter to Arab League Secretary-General Esmat Abdel-Meguid.

"The collective punishments, the refusal to withdraw from Hebron, and the Israeli army's re-conquest of areas from which it had withdrawn are a declaration of war against the Palestinian people."

Portions of the letter were read by Mohammed Subieh, the PLO's representative to the Arab League.

Arafat asked for Arab League support, and for the league "to request an immediate meeting of the UN Security Council to put an end to the closure."

Vanunu's Secrets

JERUSALEM – Mordechai Vanunu, the nuclear technician jailed for selling classified material from one of Israel's nuclear plants, has said he would reveal more classified information at the first opportunity.

Vanunu's claims were conveyed by Justice Minister David Libai, who met recently with him.

Trade Deal Signed

JERUSALEM – Israel and Qatar have signed an agreement to establish low-level economic ties, the second such accord between Israel and a Persian Gulf state.

The agreement to open trade offices in each other's countries was reached while Prime Minister Shimon Peres was making the first official trip by an Israeli leader to the emirate.

Rabin Square Dedicated

LOS ANGELES – Yitzhak Rabin Square was dedicated last week in an emotional ceremony in which Leah Rabin, the widow of the slain Israeli leader, and civic dignitaries paid tribute to his vision and courage.

Support for Communist

MOSCOW – A rabidly anti-Semitic newspaper has called on Russian voters to support the Communist candidate in the June presidential elections, saying that he will be able to solve the "Zionist question."

The weekly newspaper Kolokol, the Bell, recently explained its support for Communist leader Gennady Zyuganov on the basis that he would advance the nationalist cause.

Recent polls indicate that Zyuganov could beat President Boris Yeltsin in the June 16 vote.

Journalists launch protest after IDF finds data leaker

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The Israeli Military Police, using seized telephone records, has uncovered an officer suspected of leaking classified information to the media, an IDF spokesperson said last Sunday.

But journalists have protested, saying the move infringes on the freedom of the press and is a crude attempt to shut mouths by having reporters reveal their sources.

Legal experts, however, said the state laws are draconian enough to allow for such measures.

According to Israel Radio and Yediot Aharonot, Military Police questioned senior IDF officers, including brigadiers and at least one major-general, in the attempt to stop the leaks. Several of the officers were also asked to take a polygraph test, the reports said.

Those questioned were reportedly from Central Command, the civil administration, the office of the coordinator for government activities in the territories, the Judea and Samaria Command, and the IDF Spokesman's Office itself.

IDF spokesperson Brig.-Gen. Amos Gilad said the Military Police had discovered the source of the leaks and legal action is being taken against him, but Gilad refused to identify the person other than to say it was an "officer."

"Leaking is a very grave crime, and the Military Police will do everything it can, within the framework of the law, to catch leakers," Gilad said.

"It is not permissible for officers, who have signed a written pledge to comply with army secrecy, to establish a full-time relationship with journalists and leak whatever they feel like, including secrets that cause damage," he added.

Peres: Iran wants to destroy peace process, Labor gov't.

By DAVID MAKOVSKY and MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Iran supports terror attacks, because it hopes that in this way it can bring down the Labor government and derail the peace process, Israel's Prime Minister Shimon Peres charged last Sunday.

In an interview with The Jerusalem Post, Peres said he has hard evidence that the attacks are designed to drive Labor from power.

"They are doing whatever they can to bring an end to peace and bring an end to the government that strives for peace," he said.

"For this, I have 100 percent evidence; and we have evidence they are pressing upon Islamic Jihad and other subversive organizations to act against Israel before the elections."

But he refused to disclose this evidence.

Speaking later to the Labor party convention, Peres reminded the delegates that Iran is also behind Hezbollah. He noted the recent discovery of an Iranian ship on its way to Hamburg, Germany, carrying explosives which he said were probably intended for terrorist attacks on Jewish targets.

The Likud accused Peres of incitement in his contention that the Iranians are seeking to replace his government, presumably seeking to put the Likud in power instead.

Meretz presents platform

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Meretz's new platform, which was presented to the party's council for approval last Sunday, recognizes the Palestinians' right to a state beside Israel.

Platform committee chair Amnon Rubinstein said the political developments in the region obliged Meretz to formulate its positions vis-a-vis the permanent settlements with the Palestinians, and with Syria.

"We cannot ignore the Oslo accords, the developments in the region and the new reality being formed before our eyes," Rubinstein said.

"But we must also state fearlessly that whoever wants separation is talking about separation in territory, that there are two sovereign entities: the State of Israel and the Palestinian state, the latter of which is subject to several restrictions, including demilitarization."

The platform says that Israel must agree to a gradual withdrawal from the Golan to the international border, rather than to the 1967 border.

Meretz's campaign will also focus on social and economic issues, stressing the advantages of a competitive, free economy, alongside the need to narrow social gaps and lower taxes.

GSS captures Islamic Jihad terrorist

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The General Security Service (GSS) has captured a Palestinian from the Gaza Strip suspected of being an Iranian-trained Islamic Jihad terrorist, the army reported last Sunday.

Khalil Abu Ita told GSS interrogators he was recruited by the head of the Islamic Jihad organization in Turkey last summer, while he was studying medicine there.

Abu Ita, from the Jabaliya refugee camp, said he agreed to undergo military training in Iran and even received a fake Iranian passport from the embassy in Ankara, the army said.

Last August, he flew to Iran and was met by an Islamic Jihad representative who took him to a training base. There he met other recruits from Syria, Lebanon and the Gaza Strip and was given a code name, the army said.

Abu Ita received combat training and weapons instruction, as well as training in intelligence gathering and covert communications. The army did not say how long the course lasted.

Upon his return to Turkey, Abu Ita handed his fake Iranian identity back to his Islamic Jihad handler and resumed his medical studies, he told interrogators.

He was captured on March 12 when he tried to return home, the army said.

He told the GSS that the purpose of his training was to carry out an attack against Israeli targets.

Film examines artist's memories of shtetl life

A verbal and illustrated picture of a vanished world

The Sabbath Meal*, a painting by Mayer Kirshenblatt.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Mayer Kirshenblatt is a witness, or, as Jack Kuper aptly puts it in his brief documentary, Shtetl, "a storehouse of memories."

Kirshenblatt came to Canada from a small town in Poland in 1934 when he was 17. He thus remembers what his shtetl was like before its destruction during the Holocaust.

In Shtetl, scheduled to be broadcast on Vision TV on April 16 at 8:30 p.m., Kirshenblatt, a painter, talks animatedly of his town, as he sits by an easel and patiently paints an oil canvas of his birthplace.

Kirshenblatt is a prolific artist. Over the years, he has produced innumerable paintings of his shtetl, charming works which distil the essence of a lost era in East European Jewish history.

As he rambles on contentedly, he draws an informal but by no means complete verbal and illustrated picture of his vanished shtetl.

In a town where virtually everyone struggled for survival, Kirshenblatt recalls that, with one single herring, his mother could make an entire meal for the family.

By local standards, the Kirshenblatts were well off, but we're never told how his father earned a living.

People did whatever they could to get by, but in the hierarchy of the shtetl, water carriers were on the lowest rung.

Farmers' stalls overflow with produce

Since electricity was prohibitively expensive, workers began their day at the crack of dawn; a mother bathed all her children in the same hot water; there were no telephones or radios to speak of; and isolation seemed to be the norm.

On market day, the shtetl was overrun by farmers, as well as by thieves and pickpockets. The stalls overflowed with an abundance of produce, but Kirshenblatt never saw a head of broccoli until he immigrated to Canada.

Recalling the seamier side of the shtetl, he observes that it was serviced by two Polish prostitutes and a Jewish widow who "made herself available to selected customers."

In time-honored fashion, housewives beat their laundry on rocks in the river; and for the special Sabbath meal, everyone dressed up in their finery.

On Saturdays, Kirshenblatt suggests, Jewish breadwinners could finally rest, freed from the toil of their jobs.

Jewish life in the shtetl ended suddenly on Oct. 20, 1942, when Jews were driven out and taken on "a journey of no return." The 23-minute film concludes abruptly at this point.

On balance, Shtetl is an interesting documentary, but I cannot understand why Kuper — the author of Child of the Holocaust — did not provide more basic factual information about the shtetl and about Kirshenblatt himself. Had he done so, Shtetl would have been a better, more authoritative film.

Award will honor firms doing business in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canada-Israel Business Excellence Awards will be presented for the first time May 28 at the Inn on the Park Hotel.

Award co-sponsors Bank Hapoalim B.M. and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce will honor companies exporting to, importing from or investing in Israel, or engaging in joint ventures with Israeli companies.

The awards will be presented to companies that have demonstrated strength in their category, thus bolstering the economies of both Canada and Israel and strengthening economic links between the two countries. The awards ceremony will feature Norman Spector, former ambassador to Israel, and Art Eggleton, minister of International Trade.

Coincidentally, the ceremony will be held on the day of Israel's election for prime minister.

Regardless of the election outcome, the business community will not be affected because Israel's economy is so strong, said Rafi Ben-Ami, Bank Hapoalim's chief representative for Canada, at a recent press conference. Bank Hapoalim is Israel's largest financial institution with total assets of over $44 billion (US) and more than 30 offices worldwide.

Air Canada's experience since instituting flights to Israel last summer appears to bear out Ben-Ami's confidence in Israel's economy.

"It often takes airlines a long time to develop in a marketplace. We've had an overwhelming response," said Kymberley Robertson, Air Canada's manager, corporate communications - Central Canada. "The business response has been excellent. Not only are we bringing tourists, but also business and cargo. In fact, we've had to leave cargo behind. We're looking at adding more flights."

Israel has become an increasingly attractive trade partner with the advent of the peace process, noted Robert Eli Rubinstein, incoming president of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry. "The very notion that there could be peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors has been enough to provide tremendous status to the Israeli economy, and that's not even actual peace," he added.

The proposed Free Trade Agreement between Canada and Israel, scheduled to be implemented later this year pending approval of both governments, will further enhance Israel's attractiveness for Canadian business, he said.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Letter from Israel: Last month, a group of North American students studying at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem released an open letter to North American Jews, urging them to show solidarity in support of Israel and not curtail their travel plans to the Jewish state.

"The past seven months have shown us that fear and violence are not what life in Israel is about," the letter reads. "Underneath the current violence, this is essentially a normal community and not the war zone it may seem from abroad....

"To sum up, our experiences in Israel have given us a great respect for peace and this country. We encourage other Americans to see Israel first hand as we have. This is a rich and fascinating place for many reasons. As much as political violence is a tragic part of Israeli life, it has not been the defining factor of our time here nor will it be of yours if you decide to come."

The letter also noted that tragic acts of terrorism have also occurred in America. It was signed by 10 students, including Elana Summers of Vancouver, B.C.

Jewish Philadelphia: Simmi Hurwitz of the American Jewish Committee has begun offering walking and bus tours of sites in Philadelphia pertaining to local Jewish history. "I try to make the early Jewish life come alive in these tours, as well as portray our ancestors in a spirit of fun and warmth," says Hurwitz. "Philadelphia is a city extraordinarily rich in Jewish history, and can be a source of pride to local Jews and those who visit the city."

Highlights include stops at Elfreth's Alley, Franklin Court, Congress Hall, Mikveh Israel cemetery, the Liberty Bell and the Museum of American Jewish History. Each of these famous historical sites and institutions is steeped in Jewish history. 215-665-2300.

At Philadelphia's National Museum of American Jewish History, a show called The Challenge of Piety: Satmar Hasidim in America, and another called Making A Living: American Jews at Work, are on view through July 21. At the National Museum of American Jewish History, the exhibit Art Spiegelman: The Road to Maus runs August 1 to the end of the year.

Hotel Happenings, New York: The New York Palace Hotel on Madison Ave. at 50th St. combines the opulent Villard House mansion, built in 1882, with a contemporary 55-story tower. The focus of a multi-million dollar restoration, the historic section of the hotel, with its grand staircase and well-appointed drawing rooms, gives a good indication of how the wealthy once lived in Manhattan. 212-888-7000.

Flatotel may not be any less pricey than a good Manhattan hotel, but the company claims to give guests more space. For the cost of a luxury room, the 50-story Flatotel claims to deliver a suite with luxurious furnishings imported from Europe, a dining area, a gourmet-sized kitchen and a jacuzzi. 135 W. 52nd St. 212-887-9400.

Jacobovici film focuses on conversos

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB News editor

In New Mexico, some of the Christian gravestones are sprinkled with Jewish symbols including a stylized Magen David. In the American southwest, the cornerstone of an ancient Presbyterian church is engraved with a menorah.

These are some of the ways the conversos' Jewish heritage rises up from their subconscious.

Expulsion and Memory, Simcha Jacobovici's latest documentary, is showing on TVOntario's The View From Here series April 17 at 10 p.m. EST.

The documentary focuses on "the hidden Jews," the descendants of the Spanish Jews forced by Queen Isabella's edict in 1492 to convert to Christianity. Generations later, many of these people continue to observe Jewish customs and traditions without knowing why.

In Toronto, for example, Maria Santos is a Catholic Portuguese who lights candles every Friday night because her mother did and so did her grandmother.

"I don't know whether it's right or wrong," Santos says about lighting the candles, "but it's faith. They say faith is what saves us."

Throughout the one-hour show, which was filmed in six different countries, Jacobovici and co-producer Elliott Halpern present examples of people who only now are beginning to discover their Jewish heritage.

In a small Spanish village, a precocious young boy talks about the history of the conversos with all the confidence of a middle-aged professor. "In this [very Catholic] town," he says, " if you count back to the father of my father of my father of my father, we're all Jewish."

For over 500 years some conversos hung on to their Judaism despite persecution and the lack of synagogues, rabbis or Jewish education.

"A converso had a wall dividing his head in two," one man says. "On the outside he must show he's a good Christian but on the inside he must show to himself that he's still a Jew."

The documentary climaxes with the special outdoor concert orchestrated by Zubin Mehta in Toledo to commemorate 500 years since the expulsion. The event was Spain's way of asking for forgiveness for its chequered past.

Soo skier snags two golds at national competition

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's early spring, the snow has melted and Adam Kates has hung up his cross-country skis for another season — but not before winning two gold medals at the Canadian Junior National Cross Country Ski Championships in 100 Mile House, B.C.

Kates, a native of Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., was also named Overall Juvenile Boys Canadian Champion after posting the two top finishes in his age category, 14 to 15-year-olds, at the national event.

At last year's competition as a rookie, Kates didn't do nearly as well, finishing somewhere between 18th and 20th. But "this was my second year as a juvenile, so I had the experience. I had a really strong race and I had been there before. I knew what to expect, plus I trained way harder," he said in a telephone interview.

A quintuple-threat athlete who plays football, baseball and golf and who skis and runs cross country, Kates spent last summer getting in shape by running with his high school track team.

When the snow started falling, he took to his skis at the Soo Finnish Ski Club, where he combined long, evenly-paced training sessions with short-burst, high-intensity efforts.

His gruelling training regimen stood him in good stead not only at the skiing competition, but in the little know airport marathon that preceded it. To get to the event, he and his good friend, Brady Dunne, who finished second to Kates in the freestyle, began by flying to Toronto. From there, they flew to Calgary, then on to Kelowna and from there to Kamloops. They were then driven 320 kilometres to 100 Mile House.

Exhausting for most, but not for a 15-year-old with boundless energy. On his first day back on skis, Kates felt great during his training run.

But the next day, the full effects of jet lag and the long travel schedule hit him right in the middle of the 10-km classic. Feeling tired, he finished the day .7 seconds out of third place.

The next day, "my skis felt fast" during the 5-km freestyle race, Kates said.

(In the freestyle, skiers use a style resembling ice skaters who push out to the sides in alternate strokes and glide. In the classic, they move the skis forward in parallel strokes.)

Because of his strong finish in the freestyle, he was in the front row for the start of the final event, the 7.5-km classic race. The pack, due no doubt to youthful enthusiasm, started in a frenzy and Kates felt like he was getting trampled.

He decided to lay back and work his way back to the lead. With about six kilometres to go, he got the leader in his sights and with four kilometres left, passed him. From then until the finish line it was a tight race — a virtual chess match on snow — as his opponent stayed only inches off his heels waiting for his chance.

But Kates, a good sprinter and strong on hills, knew the course ended with two hills. He decided to hold the lead as much as he could and go for it at the end.

Adam Kates displays the skating style used in some cross-country ski events

Just as he had foreseen, he gained ground going uphill near the end of the course and outsprinted his opponent, winning by about two seconds.

"I have lots of energy in all my races. I take nice long strides on the flats and just go animal up the hills," he said in describing the winning effort.

Kates' effort produced a personal best time in the 5-km freestyle race, finishing in 12 minutes, 57.4 seconds — his first time ever under 14 minutes. He won the 7.5-km race in 23 minutes, 45.2 seconds.

The wins were the culmination of a successful season for the redhead from the Soo. He began the season with a pair of wins in classic and freestyle at a December event in Timmins. He followed that up with a first in classic and a second in freestlye at the Hiawatha Invitational in January, two firsts at the Southern Ontario Divisionals at Duntroon (Collingwood), two firsts at the Ontario Provincial Championships/Continental Cup at Thunder Bay in February and finally, the two firsts at 100 Mile House, plus a fourth.

Kates got his start on skis at age 8 when his father, Paul, also an avid skier, "used to just take me out."

He enrolled his son in the "jackrabbit" program at the Soo Finnish Ski Club. At age 13, Kates completed that program and began training with the club's racing team under coach Helen Lindfors. He began competing in races at 14.

Now 16, Kates has moved from juvenile to junior boys (16-19) and he's looking forward to competing against older skiers. He's already tested himself against them and feels confident he'll be able to more than hold his own in official events.

New ways of treating degenerative disc disease

TORONTO — Orthopedic surgeons at The Toronto Hospital are treating degenerative disc disease using a new innovative surgical technique along with a unique implant approved for use in Canada in the last six months.

Endoscopic spinal fusion surgery, which is less invasive than the traditional method, results in a shorter recovery time, a shorter hospital stay and a quicker return to normal activities for patients. The implant, known as the BAK Interbody Fusion System, is a unique technique for stopping movement of the disc.

Degenerative disc disease, which is disabling and painful, is caused by aging and wear and tear. Injury to the back can also accelerate degenerative disc disease. The discs are located between the spine bones and can be described as soft cushions which act as shock absorbers. With their deterioration, movement becomes extremely painful. Approximately two percent of the Canadian population has painful degenerative disc disease.

"Endoscopic spinal fusion is a new technique to fuse the spine and we are doing this technique in a new way by using the BAK implant," says Dr. Izzy Lieberman, an orthopedic surgeon at The Toronto Hospital. "The technique is still investigational and is closely studied in a controlled fashion. And so far, we have had positive results."

During endoscopic spinal fusion surgery, five one-centimetre incisions are made in the abdomen. Small, hollow metal tubes known as trocars are placed in these incisions. Instruments and a camera scope are fed through the trocars into the abdomen and close to the spine. The surgeon is able to operate on the spine by way of a TV monitor.

The BAK implant is fitted between the spine bones through one of the trocars. The implants are similar to large hollow screws with holes in them and are usually implanted in pairs inside the spine. Portions of the disc and bone are drilled out and the BAK implants are screwed into the holes. Bone graft is placed inside and between the BAK implants so that bone grows through the holes fusing that section of the spine.

Endoscopic surgery

Endoscopic surgery takes two hours and is followed by a hospital stay of three to four days with no stay in intensive care. A traditional, or open, method involves a large incision in the front or back and a hospital stay of up to seven days. The BAK implant may also be used for open surgery.

"There is a decreased risk of complications such as wound infection and bleeding, a shorter surgery time and hospital stay, and a quicker healing time," Lieberman says.

Lieberman is a member of The Toronto Hospital Spinal Program established in February 1995, one of only two programs of its kind in Canada. The program comprises a multidisciplinary team of neurosurgeons, orthopedic surgeons, urologists, nurses, physiotherapists, occupational therapists and chaplains.

Award honors local doctor

TORONTO — The Peter R. Newman Humanitarian Award has been created by North York General Hospital's Department of Family and Community Medicine, in honor of a physician at the hospital who was the driving force behind an innovative resident teaching program between Canada and Dominica.

Dr. Peter Newman became physican-in-chief of Marigot Hospital in Dominica in 1969, the year after he graduated from medicine. Twenty years later, he led in the creation of a program that now sees Canadian family medicine residents complete one to two months of their training in Dominica.

The new award will be open to all members of the hospital staff including physicians, nurses, administrators, health professionals, clerical and service.

"I'm delighted that an award has been created to recognize people who want to do something out of the ordinary to help other people and groups," Newman said.

"I hope this award will encourage individuals who are doing something extra, demonstrating a personal as well as professional dedication to a cause."

Dr. Peter Newman

LIME CHICKEN

Marinade:			pinch	tarragon	pinch
1	lime, juice only	1	2	boneless, skinless chicken breasts	2
1/2 cup	white wine	125 mL		flour
1	garlic clove, finely chopped	1	2 tsp	oil	10 mL
1 tsp	ginger
Sauce:			1/2 cup	chicken broth	125 mL
1	lime, juice only	1	12 cup	tomato paste	125 mL
1/2 cup	white wine	125 mL

Mix marinade ingredients together and marinate chicken breasts for at least 30 mins. Drain breasts, flatten, and flour each side. In a large frying pan, quickly sauté the chicken in the oil, about 2 mins. per side. Remove and keep warm. Turn up the heat to high, add the sauce ingredients, and boil down until only half the original amount remains. Serve chicken breasts with sauce over top on a bed of rice. The lime adds a very fresh, exciting flavour to the chicken. Yield: 2 servings.

Recipe of the week

Please feel free to call The CJN and make requests for a favorite dish - we will try to answer. ENJOY!

Dear Jesse,

I am a 50-year-old widow with numerous health problems, and I am caring for my 82-year-old mother.

Up until a year ago, my mother seemed to be able to manage more independently. Now she seems to need more care and attention. I work full time, and it is difficult to prepare her meals ahead of time. She also can no longer take a shower herself, and would like me to help. The problem is that she wants me to help her before I go to work and that is impossible.

I am feeling overwhelmed and frustrated. How do I go about getting help for my mother?

G. A.

Dear G. A.,

Caring for an elderly parent is not an easy task, both physically and emotionally. However, there are services available to help make caregiving less overwhelming.

There are several ways in which you can meet many of your mother's needs, while at the same time respecting your own. You can contact the social service departments of any hospital or community social assistance agency. It is also possible that you may find that services for the elderly are offered through your local Jewish community.

Some cities have organizations which offer subsidized frozen or warm meals that can be delivered to an elderly person's residence. Furthermore, some social service agencies provide homecare services. A trained homecare worker will come to a client's home and help in activities of daily living with which the individual has difficulty. For example, they will prepare meals, go grocery shopping and aid the client with bathing on a weekly basis.

Finally, it is imperative that you must not neglect your own health. In terms of helping yourself, communities often run support groups for caregivers. These meetings allow for individuals to converse with others who are in similar situations as themselves and experiencing similar stresses. It is often comforting to know that one is not alone with his/her feelings of frustration and helplessness.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Pressure mounts on Lebanon

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — With its continued air assaults and naval blockade, Israel is mounting pressure on the Lebanese government to crack down on Hezbollah operations.

Foreign Minister Ehud Barak ruled out diplomatic activity to end the operation, code-named Grapes of Wrath, until Lebanon curbed Hezbollah operations against Israel.

"Right now, our guns and our aircraft are hitting the Hezbollah, and I believe that the time will come for diplomatic contacts only once the government in Beirut will realize its responsibility to take over Hezbollah," Barak said last week.

IDF Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, said that the massive wave of Lebanese refugees fleeing the repeated Israeli bombardments of targets in southern Lebanon would force the Lebanese government into action.

The Israeli raids on targets in Lebanon came in the wake of repeated Katyusha rocket assaults launched by Hezbollah on northern Israeli communities.

After Hezbollah unleashed a Katyusha attack on northern Israel April 9, Prime Minister Shimon Peres responded two days later with a series of air assaults at Hezbollah positions within Lebanon.

At the weekly Cabinet meeting, Peres offered to stop the Israeli strikes if Hezbollah ceased its rocket attacks on northern Israel.

"If the Hezbollah ceases its attacks, we will cease ours," Peres said at the meeting, adding that "Israel has the patience, fortitude and ability to continue carrying out the required actions until Hezbollah attacks cease."

The prime minister's remarks came as hundreds of thousands of Lebanese civilians fled north to escape the IDF raids, and as northern Israel came under a counter-barrage of Katyusha rockets.

The number of refugees fleeing south Lebanon reached about 200,000, after the IDF warned it would hit Hezbollah targets in Tyre

The expression on the faces depicts a sense of urgency and disruption. Seen in this photo is the evacuation of a family from Kiryat Shmona under the threat of rocket attack. More than half of Kiryat Shmona's residents sought shelter in the south, away from their homes, in an attempt to elude the Katyusha rockets launched by Hezbollah since the middle of last week. [RNS photo]

Canada Centre struck by Katyusha rocket

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

METULLA — A Katyusha rocket exploded outside the Canada Centre in Metulla around 9 a.m. last Sunday, causing an estimated $1 million (US) damage to the recreation facility that was built with the assistance of United Israel Appeal of Canada. There were no injuries.

Some 60 children were playing inside the centre's underground bomb shelter when the Katyusha exploded nearby, shattering windows and puncturing a hole in the roof of the building.

"Even if the rocket had landed directly on the centre, the children would have been safe in the underground bomb shelter," Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg told The CJN.

The shelter has been used to hold activities for Metulla children since the cancellation of classes due to the security situation. The rest of the Canada Centre, which includes a skating rink and swimming pool, has been closed since last week.

"It will take about 10 days to repair the damage," said Goldberg, "but repairs can't begin until the situation in the region is back to normal."

The rocket that fell on Sunday was the first to hit Metulla, the northernmost town in Israel, in over two years.

"It was a powerful explosion," said Jonathan Margalit, who was in his Metulla home when the Katyusha landed.

"The rocket left a deep cone-shaped hole in the lawn outside the Canada Centre," he said. "There was a lot of broken glass, a hole in the roof over the swimming pool, and damage to the wrought iron fence surrounding the complex."

It was one of 45 rockets launched by the Hezbollah from Lebanon, which landed in the Galilee on Sunday.

The News In Brief

International

CANADA

Website Awards

TORONTO – Vancouver's Ken McVay and his Nizkor Project were recently awarded the 1995 eyeSITE of the Year award.

Nizkor was started by McVay in 1995 to combat the rise of Holocaust denial and neo-Nazi net propaganda. The Web site archives megs and megs of documentation on the planned and systemic slaughter of 12 million Europeans – including six million Jews.

The eyeSITE award is given by eye magazine in association with the Microsoft Network.

Human Rights Commision

TORONTO – B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs (BBC) has once again sent representatives to the 52nd annual meeting of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva.

The BBC representatives will be focusing their efforts on several fronts, including the proliferation of hate and racist literature on the Internet and fighting terrorism.

Jerusalem's Works

OTTAWA – Some of the many varied works relating to the city of Jerusalem will be on display at the National Library of Canada as part of a unique exhibition of more than 30 rare books from the library's Jacob M. Lowy Collection of rare Hebraica and Judaica.

Among the highlights of the exhibition is the first Hebrew book printed in Jerusalem in 1841, as well as works produced by European and North American presses spanning a period of over 500 years.

ISRAEL

Mimouna Delegation

JERUSALEM – King Hassan II of Morocco, for the first time, is sending an official, high-level delegation here to greet Mimouna celebrants, Mimouna organizer MK Rafi Edri (Labor) announced.

Edri called the visit a "further contribution of the king towards the peace process and bridging gaps between Muslims and Jews."

Among those with whom the delegation will meet is Shas spiritual mentor Rabbi Ovadia Yosef.

Jordan Flies Into Israel

TELAVIV – Royal Jordanian Airlines last week flew its first scheduled flight into Ben-Gurion Airport.

In another step also taken toward full normalization of ties between Israel and Jordan, Israeli motorists were allowed to drive private vehicles across the Arava Terminal between Eilat and Aqaba.

Palestinian Think-Tank

JERUSALEM – After receiving a go-ahead from the Palestinian Authority (PA), a leading Palestinian think-tank has prepared a declaration of principles on Jerusalem aimed at bridging the differences between the PA and Israel over the city's future.

The proposal, included in a paper entitled Projection of the Future of Jerusalem, is to be published in the upcoming journal of the think-tank, the Arab Thought Forum.

WORLD

Biography Cancelled

NEW YORK – In response to an enormous outcry from Jewish groups and individuals as well as from staff members within the publishing house itself, St. Martin's Press has decided not to publish Holocaust revisionist David Irving's biography of Nazi Joseph Goebbels.

Irving, a British citizen who was formally denounced by England's House of Commons as an apologist for Hitler in 1989, has vowed to circulate his book, Goebbels: Mastermind of the Third Reich, on the Internet.

JWI Expands Membership

WASHINGTON – Jewish Women International (JWI) recently expanded its membership eligibility in a landmark vote.

All female offspring of interfaith marriage, as well as any woman who has had a "life partner" will now be eligible to join JWI.

The decision took place last month during the organization's international convention, which kicked off the celebration of its founding 100 years ago in San Francisco.

Support For U.S. Court

WASHINGTON – Many of the same Jewish activists who have spent years facing off against Nathan Lewin are now backing the constitutional scholar in his quest to win President Bill Clinton's nod for a seat on the influential Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Lewin, best known in the Jewish world for his advocacy of the right to display menorahs on public property, has emerged as one of two finalists for the coveted seat on the court.

Lewin, the current director of the American section of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, also serves as the vice president of the National Jewish Commission on Law and Public Affairs.

Skinhead March Protested

ROME – Jews held a silent demonstration outside the Polish embassy here last week to protest a march by skinheads at Auschwitz.

Massachusetts Eases Blue Law

NEW YORK – Hankering for a beer or a glass of wine on Sunday? If you've run dry and are in Massachusetts, you're out of luck – unless you want to buy kosher wine.

The state of Massachusetts recently passed a law permitting the sale of kosher wine on Sundays, making it the only exception to laws that prohibit the sale of all alcoholic beverages in the state on that day.

But only stores that are closed for Shabbat, from sundown Friday through sundown Saturday, are permitted to sell such libations on the Christian Sabbath.

And because there are no shomer Shabbat liquor stores in the state, the new law will affect only the handful of kosher food stores that also have a licence to sell wine.

Responsibility.

As an integral part of Toronto's Jewish community, we do more than offer a service - we accept the responsibility of fulfilling some of the most meaningful religious and social traditions of our community.

This has been a tradition in our family for four generations.

BB League gives human rights awards to media

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A five-part series in the Hamilton Spectator on the Iron Guard, an international fascist and anti-Semitic movement based in Hamilton's Romanian community, was chosen as the winner in the Print/Dailies category at the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada's 21st annual National Media Human Rights Awards.

The Iron Guard traces its roots back to pre-war Romania. In accepting the award, Spectator reporters Andrew Dreschel and Casey Corstanje reported that the series resulted in Hamilton's Romanian churches' condemnation of the organization for the first time, as well as an investigation by authorities into its activities.

The awards held recently in Winnipeg coincided with the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. This was the second year in a row that Winnipeg has hosted the event.

A story on another anti-Semitic religious group called Human Life International earned Toronto's Now Magazine a second runner-up position in the Print/Non Dailies category, but the plight of Somalis in Canada and the trials of aboriginal Canadians dominated the nominations.

In the Television and Radio categories, the winners were features to do with Somalia. We Stand On Guard For Thee was a CBC Radio Sunday Morning dramatization of the beating death of Somali teen Shidane Arone at the hands of members of the Canadian Airborne Regiment stationed in Somalia, the subsequent public inquiry in Canada and the trials of those soldiers held responsible.

The top television documentary was Our Daughters' Pain, a story about Somali women now living in Toronto, who are fighting against the age-old Somali practice of female circumcision. (The tradition is practised elsewhere in east Africa as well.)

Stories about Somali immigrants in Ottawa (the Ottawa Citizen) and the difficulties Somali refugees are experiencing with the Canadian government (Now Magazine) were runners-up in the Print/Dailies and Print/Non Dailies categories.

The winner in the Print/Non Dailies category was a story in British Columbia's the Shuswap Sun entitled Food Bank — Natives Shunned. The story exposed discrimination against natives who had to use the food bank in Salmon Arm where the Shuswap Sun is published. A CBC Radio Sunday Morning broadcast on native "sentencing circles" was a runner-up in the Radio Category, while Saskatoon's Star-Phoenix was a runner-up in Print/Dailies for a story on child prostitution — many of the youngsters native children — in Saskatoon.

Perrin Beatty speaks at B'nai Brith media awards.

Two stories out of Edmonton, CBC Radio Edmonton's expose of slum landlords who ignore fire safety laws and CBC Alberta Television's look at sexism and sexual harassment in junior high schools, were runners-up in the Radio and Television categories.

Throwaway Citizens, a Fifth Estate examination of the Canadian deportation of several thousand Japanese Canadian citizens immediately after World War II, was the other runner-up in the Television category.

In his keynote address, Perrin Beatty, president and CEO of the CBC, complimented the nominees and their work as the best hope for the preservation of the values that we cherish as a nation, "in a future where technology will give unprecedented freedom to individuals to choose their own course and their own system of beliefs."

Beatty, who held several cabinet positions in the Mulroney government, contrasted the use of "hard power" or brute force with that of "soft power" — the free dissemination of information through a variety of technological means such as television, the tape deck, the telephone and the personal computer.

"But it is the human component that, I believe, provides the heartbeat of soft power," he said. "It is our storytellers, our educators, our singers and our journalists who keep reminding us of who we are, what we stand for and why we wish to remain distinct.

Despite the burgeoning popularity of the Internet, Beatty remains convinced there will continue to be an important role for the "conventional media" in the world of the future.

The other highlight of the evening was a special presentation to Ken McVay the Vancouver Island-based creator of the Nizkor Project that combats hate and racist messages on the Internet.

A Man of Iron

Sometime in late June, when the sun is in the sky longer than at any other time of the year, when the fields do not yet thirst for water and when most flowers are at their deepest bloom, he will officially retire from Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, after more than 40 years in the classroom teaching young children.

But even when he walks out of the classroom, he will still be a teacher. He will always be a teacher. Teaching is the invisible force that courses through him like live electric current, travelling along the lines of his enthusiasm, his humanity and his love, lighting sparks of Judaism and mentshlechkeit in others. It was forged forever into his soul more than 50 years ago in the unspeakable crucible of Dachau and Auschwitz.

He is a man of iron, Irving Eisner.

In 1944 in Dachau, exhausted, despairing and near that point when death begins to blend, mercifully, with life, Eisner found the strength to cry out one more anguished time like Abraham his forebear, pleading for proof of God's justice.

"Dear God in Heaven, I am growing weaker from day to day. I would like to make a deal with you. Please let me stay alive; spare me from these hellish fires. I promise to devote my life to you by teaching and educating our children, your children. For you know better than I, that without the children there will be no future for our people, for your chosen people. And without the Jewish children, what future is there for your Holy Kingdom?"

Eisner survived as did his father and one of his sisters. The other five members of his immediate family did not. And he kept his promise, dedicating his entire adult life to teaching God's children about God's inscrutable ways.

Now, true to his need to teach and to explain, he has written, in two slim volumes, about the experiences surrounding his promise and its fulfilment. The first volume is called Dachau, Book One, Prisoner 89012. It chronicles the story of his family's murder and of his survival. The second volume is Dachau Book Two: Back to the Camps 50 Years Later. It describes his thoughts and emotions when he returned to the camps as a chaperone for the Ontario contingent of students on The March of the Living two years ago.

They are compelling reading.

In many respects, the details of his story are the details of the thousands of other such stories. He survived, as did most of the others, by dint of courage, determination, guile, wit and sheer random luck. His written story is not intended as a work of literature. It is intended as a record. And ever the teacher, Eisner also includes in the two books, important background information, historical data and moving poetry readings.

As these brief excerpts will demonstrate, written in a simple, unpretentious manner, the two volumes tear at the reader's heart with bold, unselfconscious honesty. For example, in the first book, Eisner describes the scene when he and his family separated from their father who was being taken by train to a prison of unknown destination.

"With our hands outstretched toward our father, we watched him go up the stairs of the train. He waved goodbye with one of his arms, which was free behind him and did not look back anymore. He couldn't say goodbye. We yelled and cried to him until our voices were exhausted and the train disappeared from sight. We gathered around our mother and started to leave the station, while in our ears we kept hearing the words of our father: "I shall live. I will survive. But I am afraid of what will happen to you...and to our children."

In the pages of the second book, Eisner returns to where the camps once stood, where millions of "kedoshim," as he refers to the six million, were swallowed up in humiliation, devastation and fire. He poignantly and achingly describes his feelings and his emotions. Because only a few survivors have returned to the "graves" of Eastern Europe, and fewer still have recorded their thoughts when they did return, this book offers the reader a rarer glimpse than usual into the seared soul of the survivor. It is heartbreaking.

"When we entered this place, [Birkenau] I was completely devastated. I lost my balance. I started to tremble. My feet could not hold me. I began to crumble. When I saw the many memorial candles burning in the centre of the barrack, I started to cry, to sob, to shout, not being able to hold back or control my emotions "Mama, ich bin do" -- Mama I am here. Your son, Izchak is here! Mama, why cannot I be with you? Why didn't you take me with you? Mama, I am not leaving you here in Poland in Birkenau. I came to take you and your children, my sisters and my brother, to take you all with me to the land of Israel, to lay you to rest at the kever, (the grave) of our father o"h (olov hashalom), may he rest in peace."

The intimacy of his cry is so touching, so distressing. Never having been able to say farewell, it seems the return to the camps is the severe existential jolt that resolves his grief, that causes the sorrow so deep in his wounded heart to pour forth. The tears flow virtually on every page. But after a time, as Eisner himself writes, he leaves his tears in Birkenau.

Taking part in the March of the Living - 6,000 young Jews from 48 different countries - carrying hundreds of flags, mostly the blue and white Magen David of Israel, singing songs, was a personal triumph for Eisner over the ghosts from the Polish and Eastern European charnel houses.

But it was only when he was in Israel one week later, with his eldest son Nathan, at the grave of his father in Haifa to place the rocks and the soil which he had brought with him from Birkenau and Majdanek under the headstone, that we sense that he has completed his journey and found finally, more inner peace, this man of iron, this teacher for all times, Irving Eisner, Prisoner 89012.

AIDS victim remembered for 'heart filled with love'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some knew him as Kael, while others called him Robert, Bobby or Bob Shriar, but everyone who spoke at a recent memorial service for the Toronto man who succumbed to AIDS on New Year's Eve expressed how lucky they were to have had him in their lives.

His different names reflect the many dimensions in his life, said Marci Rose, who co-chaired the Holy Blossom AIDS committee with him for 18 months. "He was a son, a grandson, a brother, an uncle, a teacher, a friend and a volunteer and everyone was a better person for having known him," she said of the Winnipeg native who died at age 46 after living with AIDS for more than 10 years.

She said that Kael, son of Rupert and Alyse Shriar, social workers and active community members, brought to the committee a Jewish perspective that everyone involved will miss.

"His goal was to bring awareness of HIV and AIDS into the community and he wanted to make sure that everyone always had somewhere to turn," she said.

Rose credited Kael with being instrumental in arranging the third seder for those either affected or infected by HIV and AIDS sponsored annually by the Holy Blossom AIDS committee as well as the temple and its brotherhood and sisterhood. "He made sure that people without transportation were able to get there and he reached out to people who might otherwise have had nowhere to go.

"The fact that more than 80 people from so many different parts of his life turned up at his memorial service speaks of someone who maintained ties with everyone who was important to him. He did not see color, race, sexual orientation or illness. He just saw people and it takes a very special person to do that."

Julie Levine, one of the several people who spoke about Kael at the service, recalled him as having a "heart filled with love and being generous with his money and belongings. He often gave out loans for food or rent and once gave up his bed so his friend could have somewhere to sleep. He never made it to Israel, the country to which he most wanted to go, but I have no doubt that that will be the first place he visits now that he has abandoned the body that failed him."

Others talked about the great influence Kael had on their lives and how they enjoyed the time they had with him.

"He is still living deep inside me and will always live with me," said Filipe Carabineiro after reading How Can We Understand Death.

Elaine Meller Todres, who knew Kael for 40 years, from the time they attended a Winnipeg Hebrew day school, remembered him for his wit, brains, strength and spark. "I will always remember that it was he who introduced the students at our school to the Beatles."

Kael's mother, Alyse Shriar, was not scheduled to speak but said she felt compelled to say how moved she was "by the generosity and spirit of the gathering. This evening is more about life than death. Bobby never backed away from a challenge or denied a request and he loved nothing better than his family. Central to each of Bobby's relationships was his caring. He could not save lives, but he could make them better and his legacy is a command to improve the quality of life. In the meantime, before there is a cure for AIDS, we all have each other, and Bobby knew that."

The service included a reading by Andrew Cohen entitled These Do I Remember and music by Jennifer Hellen and Bob Beckwith. It ended with Kaddish.

Leah Rabin to visit

TORONTO — Leah Rabin, the widow of the late Israeli prime minister, will be the keynote speaker at the Toronto dedication of the Yitzhak Rabin Scholarship Fund for the Advancement of Peace, established by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

The dedication will take place on May 7, at the Elgin Theatre.

The scholarship fund will promote the pursuit of peace at an international level and focus world attention on the role Yitzhak Rabin played in helping bring peace to the Middle East.

Each year, based on outstanding research or involvement in the study of peace throughout the world, an individual of international acclaim will be chosen to serve as the Rabin Scholar. Recipients will be granted major financial support to continue their work at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In recognition of the Canadian impetus in the creation of the fund, at least one scholarship per year will be awarded to a Canadian student committed to graduate studies in one of the requisite areas.

Chairs of the event are Charles Gold, vice-president of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University; Gerald Halbert chair of the executive of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University; and Brian Steck, chair and CEO of Nesbitt Burns.

To contribute to the fund or for tickets to the dedication event call Merle Goldman 485-8000.

Israeli civil rights group represents broad spectrum

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Moshe Cohen's confession that he used to dislike law (when he first started studying it) comes as a surprise. The 28-year-old Israeli lawyer has an almost palpable affinity for his area of expertise — constitutional law and human rights.

After being admitted to the Israeli Bar, Cohen spent the 1994-95 year on staff as a litigator on human rights issues at the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), a grantee of the New Israel Fund (NIF). He is currently working on a master of laws degree in Washington, D.C., on a U.S.-Israel Civil Liberties Law Fellowship, which is an NIF project.

"People think ACRI is a left-wing organization. That's absolutely not true," said Cohen during a recent interview in Toronto. ACRI lawyers have represented ultra-Orthodox Jews and right-wing extremists in cases concerning police brutality, he noted.

"Human rights are universal. They don't look at what you say or who you are. This is what's nice about human rights."

Hearing the enthusiasm in his voice and the clarity with which he expresses himself, it's easy to picture him in front of a classroom. In fact, as an assistant teacher, he taught a course on Constitutional Law in Israel at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

An alumnus of that university, he completed his law studies cum laude and went on to begin a PhD thesis on The Limitation Clauses in the new Basic Laws in Israel as a Defense Mechanism of Human Rights, an issue he is examining for his LLM thesis as well.

Israel's "basic laws," or constitution, went into effect in 1992 to protect human dignity and freedom of occupation.

The limitation clauses, designed to balance the bill of rights with the public interest, were modelled to a large degree on Section 1 of Canada's constitution, Cohen explained.

Unlike in many other countries, the limitation clauses for Canada and Israel are all-encompassing, rather than having individual clauses specific to each human right. In Canada, Section 1 of the Constitution precludes infringing upon rights "unless demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society," said Cohen.

Moshe Cohen

The Israeli version precludes infringement "unless it respects the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, serves a worthy cause and does not exceed the necessary," he said.

Thorny religious issues, such as the legality of secular marriages (not an option in Israel) and concerns over publishing "indecent" material, have made it difficult to constitutionalize rights such as freedom of the press and freedom of religion, Cohen explained, although some experts feel the latter rights are implicit in the right to human dignity.

He sees the basic laws as a significant first step towards a comprehensive Israeli bill of rights.

Right now, though, peace and personal security issues have taken precedence over human rights issues, said Cohen.

He has mixed feelings about Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres' decision to seal off the territories in the wake of recent suicide bombings by Hamas terrorists.

"In times of public emergency there's a real need to do something, to respond. This is how I also feel. But you must think twice when you're so outraged, because the consequences can be [different from] what you think they will be.

"The basic notion [of human rights] is that collective punishment is not the right punishment. The one that did the damage should suffer the consequences. In this case, we don't have anyone to punish. He's dead. The argument of the government is that if the suicide bomber knows that his family will suffer the consequences, he will think twice before doing it."

Cohen sighed deeply. "I have big problems with this argument."

Cohen himself does not have the answers, he said, but he cautions that "we should keep in mind the purpose of suicide bombers. They want to stop the peace process. If we help them do it, it's a very big mistake."

As the interview drew to a close, Cohen prepared to leave for a conference on the Canadian Charter. "What could be better for me [to do here] than to go there?" he asked.

Tel-Aide provides community with lifeline

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

About a year ago, a woman called her husband at his office, only to learn that he had lost his job several months earlier.

He had managed to hide the truth by pretending to go to work. Every day, he told her not to call him — he would phone her — because he'd be out of the office.

When she discovered the truth, she was "so distraught" she called Tel-Aide, the Jewish telephone distress line, said Bonnie Kates, the Tel-Aide volunteer who picked up the call. "It was devastating. She cried. She was ashamed to tell her family."

By the end of their conversation, the woman was able to calm down and start dealing with practical issues; she decided to get a job, Kates said. "It was one of the saddest calls I have ever had."

And there have been plenty of calls. Kates, who has been involved with Tel-Aide for 11 years, now chairs the organization. She has spoken to hundreds of people in stressful situations, the most common of which involve relationship and financial problems, she said.

Many callers are under professional care and may use Tel-Aide from time to time as an additional support, Kates said. But some may call three to four times a day if they are under severe distress.

Tel-Aide, in existence since 1985, is a volunteer-run organization which operates on a shoestring budget: There are no paid staff, space is donated and a small grant covers other expenses like the telephone lines and staff training. Tel-Aide also raises funds by selling tribute cards — three for $10 — for special occasions.

The service is strictly anonymous, but volunteers give out the numbers of community resources. The anonymity makes it easier for many people to confide to the Tel-Aide volunteers, Kates said.

Some 50 volunteers man the Tel-Aide lines, which log 200 to 300 calls a month. The lines are open 13 hours a day, 9 a.m. to 10 p.m. Monday through Thursday, with early closings on Friday.

The volunteers work an average of eight or nine hours a week and cannot be younger than 22. They must be Jewish, Kates said, because "there is an instant bond with a Jew and a Jew. Eight percent of the callers aren't Jewish ... They think [Jews] have the answers."

Two volunteers work together on every shift in case a suicide call is received. Then one volunteer can contact the police emergency medical department, which traces the location of the caller and sends out medical assistance, Kates said.

"Five years ago, suicide calls were rare, possibly one or two a year. Now we're having three to four a month. More people are talking about it."

She attributed the increase in suicide calls to the strain on relationships caused by increased financial distress in the '90s and the general lack of family support systems.

Tel-Aide volunteers listen and provide verbal support, but often that's not enough, Kates said.

"You can't always cure the problem or fix it. It's a tough lesson to learn ... I have seen the volunteers moved to tears."

She compared the group of volunteers — many have been involved from five to eight years — to a family. "People really look out for one another ... Many friendships have been formed."

And she is always on the lookout for new volunteers, offering training sessions several times a year, she said. There are also monthly in-service education programs for ongoing volunteers.

Kates gets "more out of Tel-Aide than she puts in" because "listening to other people's tzuris" helps her appreciate how good her own life is, she said.

Forum to focus on gay children

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ever since Jewish Parents of Gay and Lesbian Children was established as a self-help/support group in 1989, there has been a steady flow of parents — and young gay men and women — seeking them out.

The group, which meets monthly at Holy Blossom Temple, is co-sponsoring a forum on May 7 about Gay Sons and Daughters in the Jewish Family. The program will begin at 8 p.m. in the temple's Maurice Eisendrath Auditorium. It will be co-sponsored by Holy Blossom's Department of Jewish Living.

Featured speakers will be Marg Schneider, assistant professor, department of Applied Psychology at Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and author of Often Invisible: Counselling Gay and Lesbian Youth; and Nurit Adler of Jewish Family & Child Service, who facilitates a weekly support group for Jewish gay, lesbian and bisexual students.

A couple and their gay son will also be on the podium. All participants will be available to answer questions, and a number of group members will be on hand to answer questions or talk with people individually, if they wish.

For further information, call the group's confidential voice mail line at 416-763-9111.

Helpless spectators

It was a pathetic but telling sight. Lebanon's Prime Minister Rafik Hariri admitted last weekend to reporters that he does not have the capability to control Hezbollah. Pinned helplessly under the fierce boot of his brooding Syrian overlord, the vassal prime minister cannot even tend to the fanatic "fighters-for-God" in the south, who, in their zealotry for killing Jews, have "poached" the last shred of what was left of his country's pride and integrity. And tragically for the people of Lebanon, as of this writing, they have also poached the lives of dozens of innocent Lebanese victims.

Preferring the cover of civilian shelter to the order of battlefield manoeuvre, these religious fighters aim their rockets at Israel from within highly-populated urban and village enclaves. They bank on a double, bloody account: Israel's inherent reluctance to risk innocent civilian life and international condemnation directed at Israel for the civilian deaths which must surely result after any retaliation.

Predictably, and lamentably, many Lebanese civilians have been killed; hundreds of thousands are now fleeing to safer sites in the north. And the western media is now focussing on the human loss and dislocation as a result of Israel's response. But Israel's response was as necessary as it was inevitable. It need not apologize for taking appropriate measures to protect the life of its citizens and of the state.

Hezbollah's aim is to extinguish the Jewish state. They have never left any doubt about this. They are Iranian proxies playing on Syria's field of dreams in the despicable game of shoot-at-the-Jews-and-hide-among-the-spectators. The Lebanese, unfortunately, are the spectators, helplessly, pathetically relegated to the sidelines bearing the brunt of Iran's fanaticism, Syria's hegemony, Hezbollah's hatred and Israel's determination to live securely, at peace, forever.

Judged by his actions

Two levels of Quebec's government must be held to account for the insensitive, bullying treatment by the Office de la Langue Française (OFL) toward the Jewish community in causing Passover foods to be removed from certain grocery stores on the eve of the holiday. At the very least, the OFL bureaucracy behaved zealously, perhaps even recklessly, urging the stores to "act rapidly since kosher products are on the shelves for only a limited amount of time." There is also a sense, however, that the OFL acted deliberately and mischievously, countermanding a long-standing agreement with the community regarding the packaging of foods used only during the eight-day holiday. "It is not only a question of removing these products. It is also necessary that you receive a confirmation from your suppliers that they will francisize their labels in order to prevent this infraction from being repeated in future years."

And what of the political masters of the OFL? By their silence, they acted indifferently. It is very unlikely that Premier Lucien Bouchard, away on vacation, knew of the severity and the inconsistency of the OFL's Passover foods packaging policy before the holiday. But it is inconceivable that he was left in the dark once the issue became public two weeks ago. And yet, there was no official rebuke of the OFL or other appropriate intervention on behalf of the singled-out minority, in this case the Jewish community.

Bouchard has made a very public and celebrated effort to allay the post-referendum anxieties of Quebec's ethnic communities. The apparent lack of political will by his government to act quickly and reasonably on so important a religious matter begs the question of its credibility. He will be judged by his actions, not by his words.

Rosh Chodesh is not ignored

Re: "Women Credited for Revival of Rosh Chodesh Celebration" (CJN April 3)

Contrary to the misinformation carried in this article, Rosh Chodesh has not been "pretty well ignored except for a prayer once a month." Every Rosh Chodesh, Jews for many centuries have been reciting Hallel, making additions to the Shmoneh Esrei and offering blessings.

Every aspect of Jewish life involves both men and women and the tragedy is that the women discussed in the article trivialize those roles, and Judaism, as an excuse for pushing their own agendas, which often have little to do with love for Torah and HaShem.

If, instead of trying to create religion in their own image, the individuals referred to in the article truly recognized themselves as having been created in the image of the Creator, they would find that the world of Torah Judaism is much more inviting than their world of humanly created vanities.

Finds comparison to Holocaust offensive

Re: "Yesha urges leadership ..." (CJN March 28)

Just as Laurence Zeifman cannot sit idly by while Diaspora Jewry shows its respect for the democratically elected government of the State of Israel, so must I now prod Zeifman and his Friends of Yesha to consider how disturbing their tactics are.

Though I was not among the recipients of the letter mentioned in your article, I have personally heard supporters of the Friends of Yesha make the comparison between North American Jewry's silence during the Holocaust and that during the current peace process. As an Israeli citizen and as a Jew, I find this comparison extremely offensive.

Zeifman and his group seem to overlook the most important difference in this ludicrous analogy: Israel's decision and policies are in her own hands, decided by the people who must live and die by the choice made. Those of us who choose to live in the Diaspora have no right to dictate what is best for the country!

Oil blocks action against terrorism

The failure of the March 13 anti-terrorism summit in Sharm al-Sheikh is an alarming signal that the actors in the global market are lacking good values. For this reason, economics is not a viable solution to the problem of terrorism.

The economic market serves as an indicator of what investors value most. According to the recent summit, 26 countries (excluding Israel, the United States and Britain) value their relations with the oil rich country of Iran more than helping to stop terrorism. What this means is that Iran can do what it pleases and remain economically prosperous because it is rich. It is clear that Israel needs to focus on more than economic pressure to deal with Iranian terrorism.

Jews should leave Russia now

In the next six months, three major world elections will have been decided. Israel has its election in May, Russia in June and the United States in November. By next fall, the world could be a very different place! It is essential that the Jews of the former Soviet Union emigrate to Israel while they still have the chance. Anyone with friends and relatives there should encourage them to make this move now.

It is very possible that the Jewish immigration to Israel will reach the one million mark (since 1990) even sooner than most thought. For the first time in 2,000 years Israel will then, rightly so, have the largest Jewish population of any country in the world!

Dr. Edan F. Orvitz
St. Catharines, Ont.

Ending peace efforts will not stop terrorism

I do not know what it is like to lose someone I know to a terrorist attack; nor do I know what it is like to live in Israel in constant apprehension. However, I have a simple idea and a philosophical reflection directed to those who would like to end the peace process because of ongoing terrorism.

First, ending the peace process would have an insignificant effect on ending terrorism. The anti-Israel terrorists do not want to stop until Israel is destroyed; ending the peace process would make them think they are succeeding and certainly would not influence them to stop.

Secondly, it is a well known Jewish teaching that God places before us life and death and suggests we choose life. Does not God also place before us war and peace, and would not the Creator of all life say to choose peace?

Rekindling our legacy in Shoah's wake

By BILL A. SURKIS

The trial of Adolf Eichmann began in Jerusalem on April 10, 1961. More than 100 eyewitnesses gave evidence. Testimony was supported by nearly 1,600 original documents, many of which had been signed by Eichmann. A vivid account of the tragic events was unfolded: testimony about the persecution of the Jews, incitement of hostility and anti-Jewish legislation, identification, isolation, imprisonment, deportation and finally the brutal murder of millions of Jewish men, women and children. On Dec. 15, 1961, judges Moshe Landau, Benjamin Halevi and Yitzhak Raveh ruled that Eichmann had done everything in his power to carry out his orders in the harshest and cruelest manner possible. Eichmann was executed on June 1, 1962.

The accounts of the Eichmann trial were broadcast to the world. Many Jews, and the youth of Israel in particular, thus learned about the inhuman and brutal methods employed by the Nazis and their collaborators. We learned of the heroism of the Jews in the ghetto and camp revolts and we learned about resistance of the human spirit. Worldwide interest in the Shoah increased and many of those who emerged from the inferno and chaos began to recount their experiences.

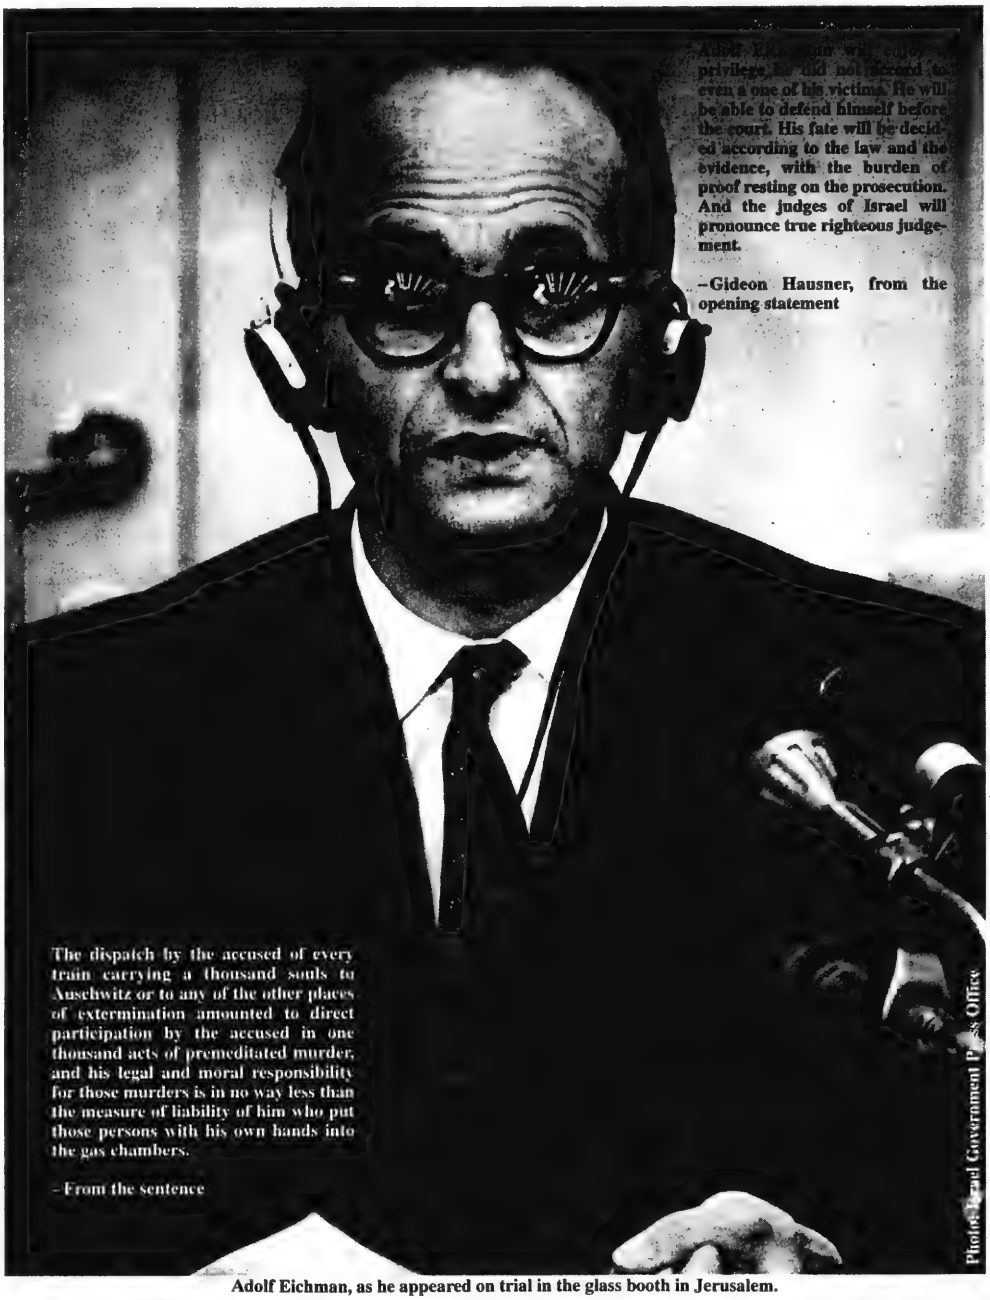
The trial itself represents the bringing to justice of a criminal. It is a milestone and a part of the record of the Shoah. Our focus and attention, however, should not be the trial, but that which the trial disclosed, and that which is our legacy.

This week Jews around the world held commemoration services marking Yom Hashoah. The Holocaust has become part of our vocabulary, but the inferno it represents remains unfathomable. The Holocaust stands in the history of man as the paradigm of the destructive power of prejudice and anti-Semitism. After 15 years of the Third Reich, nearly 5,000 years of Jewish life and culture lay waste across the continent of Europe. We must remember and mourn six million of our brethren who perished in inexplicable horror. We must continue to remember what was lost.

The Shoah is often taught through the accounts of the massive brutality brought upon the Jews of Europe and North Africa. The names of the killing centres have become indelibly engraved in our minds. But what we need to integrate into our teaching of the Shoah is the history and the broad richness of the culture that was destroyed.

We are the heirs. We hold in trust the memory of those who perished. We are responsible for teaching our history, our tradition and our culture. We must preserve the artifacts of the pre-Holocaust period so that they will illuminate our knowledge. It is with an understanding of the history of the Shoah that present and future generations will be empowered to transform the survivors' memories into knowledge. We have a collective responsibility to work increasingly to combat hatred, bigotry, prejudice and anti-Semitism.

Time is running out. In the near future there will be few survivors of the Holocaust left to recount their experience. Every effort must be made now to record the histories of the witnesses who make their homes in Canada. Documentation, artifacts and personal memorabilia must be gathered and preserved so that we will be able to use them to teach the history. A Holocaust curriculum must be integrated into our educational system and Holocaust museums and centres must be opened to allow this material to be seen and understood.



privilege, he did not accord to even a one of his victims. He will be able to defend himself before the court. His fate will be decided according to the law and the evidence, with the burden of proof resting on the prosecution. And the judges of Israel will pronounce true righteous judgement.
–Gideon Hausner, from the opening statement
The dispatch by the accused of every train carrying a thousand souls to Auschwitz or to any of the other places of extermination amounted to direct participation by the accused in one thousand acts of premeditated murder, and his legal and moral responsibility for those murders is in no way less than the measure of liability of him who put those persons with his own hands into the gas chambers.

Adolf Eichman, as he appeared on trial in the glass booth in Jerusalem.

We must teach individuals, Jew and non-Jew alike that everyone must take a stand against hatred and persecution. We must teach about the courage to care, the courage of the Danes in rescuing the Jews of Denmark, the courage of the citizens of Le Chambon who defied the Nazis by providing safe haven, the courage of the ghetto fighters, the courage of the chroniclers of the history of the Warsaw Ghetto, the courage of the many who risked life and limb to help shelter Jews, the courage of the youth of Warsaw who published underground newspapers with the theme of for your and our freedom. We must integrate this knowledge into our teaching.

I am often reminded of the folklore of the father who gathered his family to recite the Friday night kiddush. He filled the family's glasses to overflowing. When he tried to fill his own, no matter how much he poured, the cup remained unfilled. He opened a second and then a third bottle and his goblet still remained unfilled. He cast his eyes to heaven and plaintively asked why. An angel passing by heard the plea and was so moved that the angel began to cry. A single tear fell into the wine glass and it filled to overflowing.

Even at the most festive of occasions such as a wedding, a cup is broken under the chupah in remembrance of the destruction of the Temple. Commemoration of the Holocaust will in the future become integrated into our collective customs. The trial of Adolf Eichmann will be forgotten. The memory of the Holocaust and what was lost will remain our legacy.

Defending my Jewish ethnicity

Racist. Discriminatory. Zealot. I've been called all of these names during my past two years of studying in Halifax. More than once. By many people.

By Viva Press

Most of my fellow students know I'm Jewish. I don't hide it. My Magen David around my neck is a giveaway. So, too, is the fact that I do not attend school on yamim tovim, nor do I write exams or tests on these days. And those who are unaware of the significance of my beliefs know about my practices from my friends.

For the most part, my Jewishness is accepted. It is even revelled in. My friends love spinning dreidels on Chanukah, trying new foods and lighting the candles on Shabbat. But there are some people who think I'm a racist. I'm not.

A classmate recently asked me if I would date somebody who is not Jewish. I do not publicize my response, as I am in a minority group in Halifax and I don't want to be offensive. But when someone asks me directly, I answer directly. And I said, "No." He was shocked.

"So, you're racist," he told me.

Racist? No, I am not racist. Nor am I a zealot, nor discriminatory — all things he suggested that I am. Just because I don't date someone of another faith does not make me a racist. In fact, I'm far from it.

If there is one thing I learned from Jewish history, it is that as Jews we cannot afford to be racist. We are a minority. We have suffered throughout history at the hands of pople who hate us because we are Jews. If anything, we must have tolerance. How could we Jews be racist when we know how it feels to be the victims? And most recently the film Anne Frank Remembered has driven this point home even more forcefully. We must not discriminate.

Right away I told him that I did not speak for all Jews, but I did represent what many Jewish people see as necessary for survival. I told him assimilation is a huge problem. I told him that I grew up Jewish, and in the future I wanted my family to remain Jewish. Wholly Jewish. He said if I did not interdate then I had to be racist.

It was strange that he, of all people, would call me a racist. We met in Hinduism class in the first semester and we were together in Buddhism class in the second. My minor is in comparative religion. If I was a racist, why would I be so interested in learning about other people's faiths?

The classes are set up so that everyone has the opportunity to ask questions. The professor regularly checked with me whether the Jewish comparison he was making was a valid one. Everyone in the class knows I am Jewish. Everyone in the class knows my friend is Hindi.

I told him his Hindu beliefs have nothing to do with my answer. It is a religious decision, but he is still adamant about my being racist.

I told him I would date Jews regardless of their origin. But I also said that simply because someone is Jewish, does not mean I would automatically date that person. He, like many others, told me that if I date a non-Jew it doesn't mean I have to marry him.

"True," I said. "But who knows where a relationship will lead. I'd rather not build up a relationship I don't want to continue long term."

This is not an attack on this one person. His responses are just an example of my experience in being confronted with questions relating to my Jewishness, questions I deal with almost every day at school.

I grew up in a Jewish environment. All my friends from high school are Jewish. I have never been confronted with this attitude before. It sometimes gets annoying. I take offence at being called racist. My friends who attend universities with a large contingent of Jewish students have not come under this type of scrutiny. I don't want to change schools. My program is very good, and I do have a lot of non-Jewish friends.

I think it's necessary for me to explain my ethnicity so that there is a Jewish voice among my peers. For most of them from the Maritimes, I am the first and only Jewish person they know. It is important that I explain Jewish beliefs.

I have two more years of study in Halifax. I will frequently be called a racist. And I will constantly defend my Jewish ethnicity.

Spring — students' season for stress

As the month of April creeps up on us, most people's minds are on Passover, the arrival of spring and summer plans. But for those of us who expect to graduate from university this year, the month of April represents something very different. We suffer from a common ailment which has been diagnosed as the anxiety of graduating. The root cause is anticipation of entering the real world and a fear of the great unknown. However, students suffer from it in a number of different ways and for a number of different reasons and while this condition is by no means terminal, it can be very distressing.

By Ilan Gewurz

Graduation means leaving the stability and familiarity that has existed in our lives during university. The close friendships we have established will not be as easy to maintain. And what about all those school friends, those people we chat with in the library or with whom we take study breaks? Are all those who have not made it into our personal phone books no longer going to be a part of our lives? "You know what's his name," a friend of mine recently asked me, "that guy that I speak to every Thursday morning in political theory class? I am really going to miss him."

But more than just moving beyond the current reality, graduation requires us to make serious decisions which will impact significantly upon the future course of our lives. In almost every conversation on campus, you can hear someone ask: "What are you planning for next year?"

Next year is the great shared anxiety, yet we are all anxious for different reasons. Some can get in to the most prestigious schools but do not have the financial means to do so, while others can afford to go anywhere they'd like but do not get accepted. Not having any good options for after the summer can be a source of tremendous stress, but having too many options can have the same effect. I recently congratulated a friend on winning an award of academic excellence which entails a year of study in France.

"This only adds to my anxiety," she responded. "I was having a hard enough time deciding between the U of T Law School and the London School of Economics before this came along."

The application process itself is a source of tremendous anxiety. Some of us have taken every standardized test available — the GRE, the LSAT, the MCAT and the GMAT. We've filled out so many applications for fellowships, scholarships and internships that we've become experts in coloring "our past" and "what our future holds," in order to give us the edge. Somehow that one tennis match we won by default at 10 years of age has classified us as "champion of a local tennis tournament."

After writing dozens of such applications I finally asked my father to read one of my personal statements; he was so impressed he asked if he could meet the guy.

But no matter how qualified one is, the anxiety of what the next step should be and whether it will work out, is a very real one. If we really knew what our future held perhaps we would not have the anxiety of uncertainty now, though knowing for certain what the future holds might be even more distressing. We talk about it and ask others what path we should choose, but deep down we know that no one can answer that but us.

We are often advised to "do things while we're young," for it is easiest and best to gather original and interesting experiences at this age, when no one else is dependent on us. At the same time, there are always societal and other pressures that urge us to follow the conventional path of pursuing a career. "There are risks," we are told, in "leaving the system" for too long, though there is no guarantee that even intense career training will assure us of a job.

All this is a normal part of the process, and in fact a little anxiety may be good in motivating us to make better decisions. But we must always be aware that while we may have only limited control over our external realities, our internal peace of mind is more within our capacity to control. As long as we realize that our primary sense of well being comes from our acceptance of self and not from what we can or cannot achieve or who we'd like to become, then this anxiety of graduating will serve its purpose without causing any serious damage.

Chosen for Divine service

Jewish history is a succession of vast improbabilities. It is studded with unlikely heroes, impossible coincidences, enormous failures and astounding successes. It has received more attention, more literary, historic and philosophic treatments — to say nothing of theological considerations — than any comparable group in history. Proponents and opponents have described its subjects in extreme terms, reaching from "the chosen of God" to "devils incarnate." The Jews have been called mankind's greatest blessing by some and mankind's greatest scourge by others. Scholars of many kinds have tried their hands at describing or solving the puzzle of this people's existence.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Chosenness is one answer, and it is certainly worthy of serious consideration.

Jewish history revolves around this very concept. To be a Jew was and is a privilege, and in daily Jewish worship, the idea is repeated time again. We praise the Maker of heaven and earth who has set us apart from other families of the earth, giving us a destiny unique among the nations.

The Torah tells us that the choice of Israel goes back to Abraham and was confirmed at Sinai. It was acknowledged by a people who affirmed, "All the Eternal has spoken, we will do." In this grand view, God's plan for humanity can be put into effect only if Israel is faithful and only then the world at large will see salvation. God and Israel are forever intertwined and depend on each other.

It is without question a grand if "unreasonable" concept. But then, is grandeur ever reasonable? Against all odds, Jews have played a role quite out of proportion to their numbers. They have not fared materially better than others; on the contrary, their task has exposed them to persecution and oppression, to anti-Semitism and to the Holocaust. Yet belief in the divinely appointed task has never disappeared even when it has been difficult to maintain. It was difficult a long time ago among conditions of exile, and modern times have not eased the problem of believing in a God who chose this people for Divine service, despite all appearances that were denying such a choice.

When it comes right down to it, this is the burden of belief. Many Jews (as well as many gentiles) think such a concept has become outmoded. To their ears, it is disconnected from an often harsh reality; while to those who continue to believe in the Divine promise, being a member of the Jewish people is an infinite privilege which is grounded in special obligations, called mitzvot. For them, there is nothing more glorious than to be a servant of the Holy One. The only privilege that this belief entails is the self-assumed obligation to be God's servant at all times and with full devotion, not because we are in any way superior to others, but only because God's mysterious plan has so provided.

Chosenness does indeed deserve serious consideration.

The Kirshner File

The Holocaust in words and photographs

By Sheldon Kirshner

Like it or not, the Holocaust looms large in our collective conscience. Publishers, naturally, cater to this fascination.

Here, then, are some of the latest books dealing with the Holocaust and related events.

History of the Holocaust (Westview Press, $89.95 US) is an extremely useful, one-volume account of the Shoah. Complete with graphs, tables, photographs and documents, this tour de force is written by Abraham and Hershel Edelheit.

The Path to Genocide (Cambridge University Press, no price listed) is an excellent primer. In a series of erudite, accessible essays, Christopher Browning sets the stage for the greatest crime ever committed in the annals of humanity.

The Origins of Nazi Genocide (University of North Carolina Press, $45.50) may be considered a companion volume. Here, Henry Friedlander expertly explains how the Nazi program of euthanasia evolved into the systematic extermination of Jews and Gypsies.

The Nazi Connection (Oxford University Press, $30.95) outlines the relationship between the eugenics movement in the United States and the Nazi program of "racial hygiene." Stefan Kuhl's revealing book is an indictment of the baneful influence American scientists exercised on the Nazis' policy of "racial purity."

The Holocaust and the Liberal Imagination (Blackwell, $54.95) attempts to answer the controversial question of how the democratic world responded to the Final Solution. Tony Kushner's thoughtful essays range far and wide.

The Nazi Dictatorship (Routledge, $21.50), by Ian Kershaw, plumbs the essence of the Third Reich, with one chapter expressly devoted to Hitler's relation to the Holocaust.

Life in the Third Reich (Oxford University Press, $25.50), edited by Richard Bessel, is composed of six succinct essays on various aspects of Nazi society, including its anti-Semitic dimension.

The Holocaust and the French (HarperCollins, $40) is Susan Zuccotti's bracing analysis of how a nation responded to the persecution of its Jewish population. True, the Vichy regime was shamelessly anti-Semitic. Yet about 76 percent of French Jews survived the Holocaust. With envious skill, Zuccotti explains this discrepancy.

Oskar Schindler and His List (Paul S. Ericksson, $24.95 US) explores the Schindler phenomenon in depth. Thomas Fensch's informative compendium — which draws on newspaper and magazine articles from the American press — introduces us to the first journalist who interviewed Schindler back in 1949, and helps us understand why Thomas Keneally wrote Schindler's List and what inspired Steven Spielberg to make his Academy Award winning film based on Keneally's book. The last half of Oskar Schindler and his List consists of movie reviews and think pieces about the Holocaust.

Secret Germany (Penguin, $7.99) revolves around Claus von Stauffenberg, the charismatic mastermind of the failed 1944 plot against Hitler. Writers Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh forcefully argue that the conspiracy hatched by Stauffenberg and his circle was driven by moral and spiritual necessity rather than political expediency.

Auschwitz and After (Yale University Press, $25) is an impressive memoir, Charlotte Delbo's moving story of her incarceration in Auschwitz and Ravensbruck. Delbo — a French Christian — and her husband, Georges Dudach — a resistance leader — were arrested in March 1942. Dudach was executed, but Delbo was spared, only to be deported to Poland.

Auschwitz 1940-1945 (Route 66 Publishing, $8.95 US) is an ABC of the Nazi concentration camp which has become synonymous with the Holocaust. Simply written and presented, it can be read by adults and older children alike.

Anatomy of the Auschwitz Death Camp (Indiana University Press, $39.95) is probably the last word on the subject, a tome which leaves no stone unturned. Published in association with the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, it is edited by Yisrael Gutman and Michael Berenbaum.

The Buchenwald Report (Westview Press, $35 US) is a unique document, the original, damning report of a special team of U.S. army intelligence officers dispatched to that camp upon its liberation on April 11, 1945. Comprehensive and chilling, this book has not been diminished by time. It is still one of the best accounts of a German concentration camp and its hapless inmates.

Nazi Mass Murder (Yale University Press, $30 US) refutes in telling detail the rickety claim by Holocaust deniers that systematic gassings never took place. The grim truth is related by 24 writers from six countries, including Germany, Austria and Israel.

For a change of pace, delve into The Gates of the Forest and The Town Beyond the Wall, the Elie Wiesel novels which have been reprinted by Pantheon Books. Both, to a greater or lesser degree, grapple with the pain and anguish of the Holocaust.

Reptile Press

Shortly after Germany invaded Poland to launch World War II, the occupying force closed down newspapers and magazines owned by Poles and Jews. A subservient press monitored closely by the Nazis emerged.

The late historian, Lucjan Dobroszycki, has written a dense, scholarly book about this phenomenon, the first on the topic. Based on primary sources, it is entitled Reptile Journalism: The Official Polish Language Press under the Nazis, 1939-1945 (Yale University Press, $22.50 US).

Poland, he writes, was the only country in Nazi-occupied Europe where the local press was disbanded. Before the war, Poland had a vigorous publishing industry. But once the Nazis were in charge, it became an appendage of the German propaganda apparatus.

From the first day of the occupation to the last, the Jewish population was demonized by the collaborationist media. The anti-Semitic campaign doubtless exacerbated hatred against Jews.

Dobroszycki, a Jew, finished this book in 1967, but it was rejected by the Communist authorities. The Six Day War had ended and anti-Zionist hysteria was in vogue. Eventually, the manuscript was published in Germany. Now English speakers have an opportunity to read Reptile Journalism, a book which spares no one.

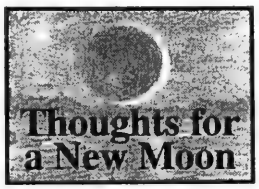
Holidays chart the historic journey of the Jewish people



By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

This month, we count the days of the Omer, the period from Passover to Shavuot. During this time, we are forbidden to engage in community celebrations and thus we cannot schedule weddings or various other festivities.

However, there are a handful of holidays which fall during the Omer period and it is important to view them in light of each other. Two of these holidays are Lag B'Omer (the 33rd day of the Omer) and Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel's Independence Day). We suspend our prohibitions regarding the Omer and we celebrate these days with both religious ritual and secular festivities.

At first it does not seem that these two holidays relate to one another and yet they chart an important historical journey that we have taken as a people.

Lag b'Omer commemorates the day when Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai and his son emerged from being sequestered in a cave. The Roman Empire was in power in Israel and the study and practice of Judaism was outlawed. Rabbi Shimon, guilty of that crime, had managed to escape with his son and they remained in hiding for 13 years.

Upon considering where to hide, the Talmud relates that he had several options, some of which were dismissed because of the rabbi's concern for his wife. He comments that if they hid somewhere known, she would not be able to withstand the Roman torture and might ultimately have no choice but to divulge their whereabouts. Literally he says: "Women have frail minds."

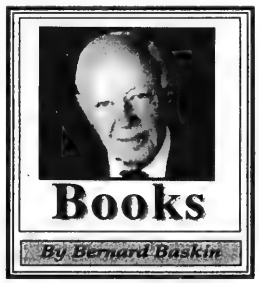
The statement is made specifically with regard to torture and the cruelties of war and captivity. Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai may have made his comment regarding all women while thinking only of his own wife. It is possible that he considered her to be frail but did not want to single her out and therefore, out of respect to her, he generalized his statement.

Whatever the reason, once the comment was written into the Talmud it echoed through time and is still cited today. Unfortunately, it is often lifted out of its original context and used as justification for excluding women from various pursuits.

Now, almost 2,000 years later, we have the opportunity to celebrate the reversal of these circumstances.

Yom Ha'atzmaut marks the date of the establishment of the modern state of Israel. Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai had to endure the Roman Empire as the governing power in Israel; we have lived to see a Jewish government ruling in Israel in our lifetime. During the War of Independence women fought side by side with men and together they achieved what had been only a fragment of a dream until that time.

The women of ancient Israel were considered too frail to withstand the realities of persecution and the hardships of war; modern Jewish women have proved themselves by participating in all facets of regaining the state of Israel. Time did not stand still; our history has moved on and many changes have found their way into our heritage. As a nation we have travelled from Lag b'Omer to Yom Ha'atzmaut.



Author shoots down today's pseudo-science

The Demon Haunted World by Carl Sagan, Random House $35.95

Recent surveys indicate that 95 percent of North Americans are scientifically illiterate. Although 45 percent say they accept the idea of evolution, only nine percent agree with the central finding of modern biology that human beings have slowly evolved by natural processes from a succession of more ancient beings. Sixty percent of adults are unaware that the dinosaurs died before the advent of human beings. Seventy-five percent do not know that antibiotics kill bacteria but not viruses and an astonishing 50 percent are unaware that the earth goes around the sun and that it takes a year to do so.

Carl Sagan, eminent professor of astronomy and popularizer of science, is shocked by these statistics. It is no wonder, he writes, that modern society is prone to superstition and swayed by psuedoscience.

He claims, in addition, that many of the worst symptoms of irrational belief have been encouraged, or at least ignored, by entrenched power structures because they deflect attention from real problems in society.

In this new, hard-hitting book the author takes it as his mission to defend the worth and importance of science against pervasive ignorance and irrationality. Objects of his disdain include astrology, creationism, religious fundamentalism and a variety of New Age philosophies. As an astronomer, Sagan is especially pained by reports of UFO visitations and alien abductions. He points out the parallels between the medieval witch-mania and the flying saucer abduction fantasy. Hallucination plays a large part in both aberrations.

Without proper knowledge of science, he asks, how can the ordinary citizen affect national or even local policy or make intelligent individual decisions about such matters as fission and fusion power, supercomputers, data highways, abortion, radon, massive reductions in strategic weapons, addiction, government eavesdropping on the lives of its citizens, high-resolution TV, airline and airport safety, fetal tissue transplants, health costs, food additives, drugs to ameliorate mania or depression or schizophrenia, animal rights, superconductivity, morning-after pills, alleged hereditary antisocial predispositions, space stations, going to Mars, finding cures for AIDS and cancer?

The author, agnostic in his religious outlook, acknowledges that some forms of religion are beneficial — those devoted to reverence, ethics, ritual, community, family, charity and political and economic justice.

This kind of religion is in no way challenged, but rather uplifted by the findings of science. He writes, "There is no necessary conflict between science and religion. On one level, they share similar and consonant roles, and each needs the other."

Sagan maintains that in every society there is a cherished world of myth and metaphor which coexists with the workaday world. Efforts to reconcile the two are made, and any rough edges at the joints tend to be off-limits and ignored.

As a partial remedy to the wave of pseudo-science, Sagan presents a valuable course in "baloney detection," as well as a catalogue of 20 logical fallacies to be avoided.

This provocative and informative defence of science is a plea for the wider dissemination of necessary knowledge before the combustible mixture of ignorance and technological power "blow up in our faces."

Hungary's secret Jewish collection

Roots & Remembrance

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Dr. Gabriel Bar-Shaked, an expert on Hungarian Jewry for Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, is convinced that a massive trove of documents on the Jews of the Austro-Hungarian Empire lies hidden in a state archives in Budapest and he's determined to gain access to it.

So vast is the collection, Bar-Shaked says, that it would allow researchers to trace back to 1850 the family trees of all 800,000 or so Jews who were living in Habsburg lands before the Holocaust. However, because the papers throw light on Hungary's Nazi period, during which two out of three Jews perished, Hungarian officials supposedly want to keep them buried.

Thus, according to Bar-Shaked and others, the Hungarian government denies the very existence of the collection, even though a section of about 200,000 pages was released by the Hungarian army for a conference in 1986.

"In the Home Office in Budapest, they have a whole archives devoted to the Jewish question, but they have been denying it until now," the Hungarian-born professor said during a recent interview. "The head of the Home Office told me that if I can find it I can get it, but that he himself doesn't know where it is."

During the German occupation, Hungary's collaborationist government established an archives, the Institute of the Jewish Question, to which all Jews of the realm were obliged to submit official documents showing that their families had lived there for at least three generations.

"If you couldn't prove it, you were sent back to the country of your so-called 'original nativity' – Poland, for example, or Russia or Romania. That's why the Jews had to collect their personal papers and file them with the government," Bar-Shaked said.

His father, a professor of history in post-war Hungary, sought out his family's papers some 20 years ago, only to be told the government no longer had them, he said.

Bar-Shaked first realized that the collection might still exist about a decade ago, after a fellow researcher showed him some papers he had received from a Budapest archives with the help of some former communist friends.

"I had never seen such documents before. One was a certificate from the schools about his occupation, another was about the paying of taxes; and there were certificates of birth and marriage – all of the items his family had sent to the Home Office to prove that they had Hungarian citizenship. The archivist evidently found these documents very quickly with the help of a computer. My friend was able to get copies without any trouble in only 10 minutes."

The researcher later requested more documents from the Home Office but was turned down and told he had received the earlier documents in error, Bar-Shaked said. "This," he said "is proof that in Hungary they have everything."

In 1989, on a trip to Budapest with French anti-Nazi activist Serge Klarsfeld, he managed to obtain a few more tantalizing tidbits from the collection, but no more.

Ironically, he has had considerably less difficulty getting details on how the Jews died. Using Nazi lists released by Hungary's post-communist regime, he has published several volumes of names – for example, Jews deported from Hajdu County in 1944, Jews sent to labor battalions and Jewish women sent to Stutthof labor camp.

Bar-Shaked said he hopes to copy the hidden Jewish documents and to catalogue them by family name in a computer database. Since two-centuries-old lists of all Habsburg citizens, including Jews, are presently available in Hungarian archives, Jewish researchers could use this material, together with the hidden Holocaust-era documents, to chart their family trees right back to the era of Empress Maria Theresa, he said.

If he is to achieve his goal of documenting the families of all the Jews of greater Hungary, he knows that he must do it without major assistance from Yad Vashem, which is focused solely on the Holocaust period. His so-called Magna Hungaria Project might eventually involve establishing a dedicated institution somewhere in Europe, perhaps Budapest, he said.

Mark Shraberman, an acquisitions official at Yad Vashem, is also involved with the Magna Hungaria Project. He is a former archivist in the State Central Historical Archives in Lviv, Ukraine (formerly Lvov or Lemberg), which holds material that "gives an extremely rich, full picture of everyday life of Galician Jewry," he said.

Considered politically sensitive, Lviv's Jewish collection was reportedly closed to researchers about a decade ago.

"All of these archives are political archives because of the Holocaust and because of communism," said Bar-Shaked. "In many cases, they are very hard to open up. But I'm sure that we are going to do it."

One in Six Million

By DANIEL KINRYS, 12 years old

I am one in six million,
A Nazi killed me.
I am one in six million,
Here is my story.

I am one in six million,
I was pinned with a star.
I am one in six million,
I escaped but didn't go far.

I am one in six million,
I was put in a train.
I am one in six million,
The conditions were inhumane.

I am one in six million,
I escaped from the train.
I am one in six million,
I was caught again.

I am one in six million,
They murdered me too.
I am one in six million,
Along with fellow Jews.

I am one in six million,
That goes to show.
I am one in six million,
That people don't know.

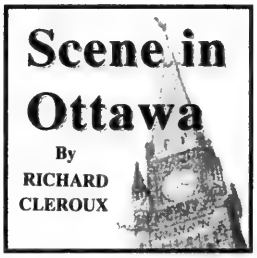
Human rights link countries



OTTAWA — For the past few years, Canada has been quietly helping Israel with its human rights and civil liberties issues and learning something in return about the effectiveness of Canada's own Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Justice Minister Allan Rock explained in a recent interview that there is a unique link between Canada and Israel in the area of human rights and civil liberties that makes an exchange of information particularly valuable to both countries.

Rock was in Israel last May to meet his justice counterpart, David Libai, and other senior government ministers including Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres.

Civil liberties and human rights figured prominently as a topic on their agenda.

"The Israelis are particularly interested in the development of our constitutional law, because Israel recently passed what it calls "basic laws," which are similar to our own Charter of Rights," Rock said.

The Israeli "basic laws" guarantee certain basic personal liberties and individual freedoms, explained Rock, "and the degree to which any Israeli law is inconsistent with these principles makes it invalid. It's much like our Charter of Rights in this respect.

"These laws are new to them, as our charter was new to us in 1982, and they are interested in knowing how our courts have grappled with the interpretation of the charter, such as when Parliament must redo a law or the strategy of the courts in giving Parliament time to change a law," said Rock.

As a result, for the past two years, a steady stream of Canadian judges and lawyers have gone to Israel to study for several weeks at a time how the Israeli "basic laws" are working out, and to lecture the Israelis on what they should expect.

In return, more than a dozen Israeli judges and lawyers have visited Canada to study what changes the Charter of Rights has wrought here.

"I'm told that of all the countries in the world, Israel is most interested in our experience," said Rock. "It's rare that a country which has a sophisticated court system and a tradition of democratic principles would also have a new constitution."

Canada and Israel are two exceptions among democratic nations.

"What most countries with our traditions have is an old constitution. But we've only had our constitution and our charter for 14 years, and our democratic traditions are similar. That's why they want to learn from us."

The program has also included Canadian constitutional law professors going to Israel to teach for a term at Israeli universities, while Israeli academics have taught during visits to Canadian universities.

Rock's trip to Israel gave him the chance to visit the sites and learn a little more about Israeli culture.

"I remember I arrived on the National Day of Remembrance for the War Dead," Rock recalled. "The following day would be the National Day of Independence. The celebrations began at sundown."

Rock recalled going down to the central square and mingling with an immense crowd, in exactly the same place where Rabin would be shot less than a year later.

The evening turned into a night of fireworks and celebration, and Rock found himself at a party where half the Israeli cabinet showed up, including Rabin and Peres. The festivities lasted well into the night, although, he chuckles, there was time left the following day for business meetings and a lunch.

Rock also visited Yad Vashem, and laid a wreath on behalf of Canada. He remembers feeling overcome with emotion on that occasion. It was even more than he had expected.

"It's located on a beautiful site on a hill overlooking Jerusalem," said Rock. "It's impossible to visit that place without being engulfed in the emotion of being involved in the enormous loss of humanity that speaks out."

Kashrut publication out

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The first edition of Es Gezunterheit, a 40-page booklet published by the Orthodox Council of British Columbia/B.C. Kosher, was distributed recently to the Vancouver Jewish community.

The council's kashrut administrator, Rabbi L. Teitlebaum, says revised editions of the booklet will be released free of charge periodically, with articles covering various aspects of kashrut. A list of all new products under B.C. Kosher (BCK) will be updated in each issue as well as "kashrut alerts" informing the public of products using unauthorized kashrut symbols.

The first issue contains an article, Koshering the Right Way, an outline of how various items are kashered for Pesach; Walking Through the Seder gives a glimpse of the seder night, with explanations of the traditions followed.

The booklet, released just before Passover, has a complete Passover information list of products requiring a Pesach hechsher on certain brand products "that have been looked into and may be used."

Teen charged with promoting hatred on Internet

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Michael Lazar, chair of the midwest region of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, commends the Winnipeg police service hate crimes unit for laying what may be the first Internet hate crimes charges in North America.

On March 27, the hate crimes unit raided a house in north Winnipeg and arrested a 17-year-old (his name cannot be revealed because he is under 18) known on the Internet as "Inbred Jed." The youth was traced through his Internet account after Mark Zoldy, a gay activist in Winnipeg, received a message on his Internet calling for "death to homosexuals" as "prescribed in the Bible."

The teenager greeted police at his door with a loaded pellet gun after he had tried unsuccessfully to erase the incriminating data from his computer. Among the items found in his room were Nazi and anarchist paraphernalia and a club with "gay bat" written on one side of it and "Jew bat" on the other.

Despite claims by the teen's father that it was all a "childish prank," police have laid charges of uttering threats to kill and possession of a weapon dangerous to the public peace against the youth. They are examining his computer contents to determine if more charges can be laid.

"Inbred Jed" had a previous brush with the law last fall, when he was charged with fraud, theft and counterfeiting (the charges have not yet been dealt with). He offered plans on the Internet on how to build bombs and gave advice on carrying out crimes.

"This is going to be a very interesting prosecution," says Lazar. "Generally when dealing with hate on the Internet, there are jurisdictional issues and questions of enforceability. In this case, the perpetrator was in the local jurisdiction. We still have to find solutions to the broader problems."

Kolel set to offer unique Hebrew course

TORONTO — Hundreds of people in 15 locations across Canada (including nine locations in the Toronto area) will learn to read Hebrew in just eight hours on April 28.

Scheduled in honor of Yom Ha'atzmaut (Israel Independence Day) the course costs $48 (Israel's age) and promises to be fun and easy. The fee includes a light lunch, textbook and all materials.

Last year, over 400 people across Canada learned to read Hebrew in a day. In Toronto this year, two levels are being offered: "absolute beginner" for those who have never studied Hebrew, and "refresher" for those who have studied but have forgotten much of what they learned. Other centres will offer the beginner level.

The course is being sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and ARZA Canada, the Association of Reform Zionists of Canada. The course is open to Jews of any affiliation, as well as to non-affiliated Jews or anyone with a desire to learn Hebrew. It is ideal for parents of school-age children, especially pre-b'nai mitzvah, who would like to be directly involved in their children's Hebrew education.

"Hebrew literacy is the key to unlocking the treasures of Jewish identity, tradition and history," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel. "It provides direct access to the richness of Torah, rabbinic text and modern literature, which are central to Jewish spiritual renewal."

Kolel acknowledges the generosity of all the locations, the Zukerman Charitable Foundation and the Canadian Zionist Federation for making this day possible.

For more information or registration, call Karen Paikin, program coordinator, National Hebrew Literacy Day, at 905-764-1-DAY or fax 905-709-1895.

Harry Cohen—believed the only Canadian to die in Shoah

By GIL KEZWER
Special to the CJN

MONTREAL – Last November, when Canada Post issued a stamp commemorating the 50th anniversary of the end of the Holocaust, it missed an opportunity to honor Harry Cohen of Montreal, believed to be the only Canadian citizen to die in the Nazi genocide of the Jews.

Neither Jerusalem's Yad Vashem memorial, the U.S. Holocaust Memorial in Washington, D.C., Oxford University World War II historian Martin Gilbert, University of Toronto scholar Michael Marrus (author of The Holocaust in History), nor York University's Irving Abella (co-author of None Is Too Many) know of other Canadian victims.

That Cohen's picture was absent from the 45 cent stamp wasn't an oversight. It is only now after more than half a century that his eldest son, Manuel Garson Cohen, 71, is willing to speak of his father's lachrymose distinction. And Cohen's three brothers and sister are too young to remember much about their father, who sailed to Europe on a business trip in 1939 and never came back.

Sitting in the kitchen of his modest bungalow in suburban Laval, Quebec, Manuel Cohen – a semi-retired manufacturer of industrial pressing equipment – recalls his father. Speaking in the unique Montréalais patois of those truly bilingual in English and French, he relates his father's story – of an ambitious, even daring businessman who loved his family and whose life was snuffed out at the age of 51.

Manuel Cohen's father Harry, known in Yiddish as Hirsch Moishe and in Hebrew as Zvi Moshe, was born in Aptov, a suburb of Lodz, in 1891. The textile centre, called the Manchester of Poland, was then part of the Czarist Empire. The Cohen family owned a jute mill in the prosperous city.

Harry Cohen's story parallels that of thousands of Canadians of eastern European origin in that era. As a result of the economic and political turmoil caused by World War I, he immigrated to Canada in 1919. Fluent in Polish, Russian, Ukrainian, German, Yiddish, Hebrew, English, French and Italian, Cohen got a job as an interpreter with Canadian Steamship Lines. But after several years, he left to fulfil the Canadian dream of being independent. Cohen became a scrap metal dealer.

"He had a two-ton Ford truck. You could deliver junk and coal too," explains Manuel Cohen. Gradually his father found coal to be the more profitable. Cohen Jr. shows an advertising blotter from the late 1920s with the inscription "H. Cohen Genuine Welsh anthracite coal is best. 4611 DesCarrieres St."

Harry Cohen

Manuel Cohen was born at that very address in 1924. "It was Victoria Day. Or, if you're French, it was Jour Dollard des Ormeaux."

From selling coal, Cohen's father – who could be called a shvitzer (hustler) in Yiddish – branched out to become a small-time real estate developer.

The Depression created new business opportunities for wheeler-dealers like Harry Cohen. "Anything he could lay his hands on," recalls his son. He would lend money to the unemployed and desperate on the proviso that the borrower forfeit his collateral if he failed to make the repayments.

Harry Cohen also used his scrap metal/coal truck to become a chicken merchant. "I helped him in his poultry business. I would travel with him in the Ottawa Valley, on both sides. The first French words I learned were 'Avez vous des poulets a vendre?' "

Other vocabulary Cohen Jr. soon picked up included "Pas de chiens ou juifs (No dogs or Jews)." At the age of 11 he lost an eye when an anti-Semitic bully attacked him with a stick.

Sometimes Cohen Sr. would barter the chickens for a sack of flour or sugar. After working around the clock, "he would drive in from Ontario bleary-eyed to Roy Street and Saint Lawrence and sell his chickens."

Harry Cohen also sold at the Jean Talon Market, where Italian immigrant matrons would go to buy live poultry. That's where, in 1934, Manuel met Mary Nanni, whom he married in 1947.

Every Christmas during the Depression, Cohen remembers his father giving away scores of chickens to needy neighbors and clients. "He was also a stingy man. He would make me work while other kids were playing. But I enjoyed every minute of it. When I said to him 'I must go to the movies,' he would answer, 'There's only one thing a person must do – die.' "

It was a gritty philosophy born of centuries of persecution and poverty and confirmed by the "Dirty Thirties."

Cohen's wife, Ida (nee Shapiro), a native of Montreal, died in 1938 following a lengthy illness, leaving him to raise four young children.

Cohen decided to entrust them to his sister Sarah Berenbaum while he returned to Poland to sell the family-owned jute factory. Though stringent currency regulations restricted the export of capital from Poland, Cohen planned to smuggle his money to Switzerland, his son remembers.

On June 6, 1939, he sailed on the Stefan Batory from New York City to Danzig. Three months later the Polish passenger liner was sunk by the Germans in the Baltic as the Wehrmacht crushed the Polish army.

"I got a letter in August 1939 in Yiddish that he was having problems with family and politics. There was a disagreement about the business end of the jute mill. "You didn't stay in Poland and now you want a bigger share,' his family was saying."

That was the last correspondence. But it took more than six years before postal communications were resumed and Manuel Cohen learned he had become an orphan.

"The war broke out September 1, 1939. There was no word. After the war, in October 1945, some information came from a woman in Lodz. 'In 1942 the Germans found out I had been hiding your father in my cellar. They arrested my husband and took away your father. They never returned.' " Sheltering Jews was a capital crime.

Cohen and his Polish protector were likely deported to the infamous Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp, where most Jews from Lodz were sent.

Together with the letter, Cohen's would-be savior enclosed a Hebrew prayer book. "I remember my father using it at the synagogue on Roy Street."

As well, there were three traveller's cheques, each for $200, signed but not countersigned by his father. "This is why I figured it was authentic. We had to go through legal proceedings to cash them."

Today Cohen regrets he no longer knows the name or address of the woman who had hidden his father. The letter in Polish was lost in 1947 when Cohen left his aunt's house.

Cohen says that for years after 1945 he used to have dreams about his father. They always took place at the house on Gilford Street. "I used to dream I was mad at him for not giving me his entrepreneurship. He was able to make money when no one else could. He was able to build a house in the Depression. I wanted the know how."

After three decades Manuel Cohen and his family reconciled. He shows a photo of his granddaughter at Jerusalem's Western Wall. In 1984, he added his father's name to a Holocaust memorial at the Beth Ora Synagogue section of the Jewish cemetery in Dollard des Ormeaux.

"Today it still gives me goose pimples."

The Best Medicine

These are challenging times for the health system. The demand for care continues to grow; government funding continues to shrink.

At Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, the imperatives are clear: Maintain a tight focus on areas of medical excellence. Work smarter by generating more knowledge and applying it. Collaborate with patients and caregivers alike in pursuit of a common goal: improved health through compassionate, high-quality care. And most importantly, ensure we continue to meet our community's needs.

Together, these are the foundations on which Mount Sinai will continue to enhance our capacity to deliver the best medicine.

THE BEST TREATMENT

The best health outcomes result when the best scientific minds focus on finding answers to medical questions that continue to confound us.

At Mount Sinai, the relentless pursuit of knowledge is embodied in our Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute. Our research is concentrated in five areas: molecular biology, oncology (cancer), genetics, fetal health (unborn infant) and epidemiology.

In each of these areas, we are the site of some of the most important medical and scientific research under way anywhere. The presence of the Institute right here in our building enables us to ensure that there is a continuum between knowledge gained in the lab and knowledge applied in clinical treatment.

THE BEST CARE

At Mount Sinai, we believe delivering the best care means helping patients make informed choices about their health. Patients in hospital are encouraged to understand what's happening and empowered to make sound decisions that affect their treatment and lifestyle.

Mount Sinai Hospital was cited among the top-rated medical facilities in North America in a recent edition of The Best Hospitals in America. Among our many quality programs, we are world leaders in five areas: perinatology, surgical oncology, molecular medicine, gastrointestinal disease and reconstructive orthopedics. We bring these strengths to bear in treating patients at Mount Sinai and in working collaboratively with community and specialty institutions to ensure that people have access to the best medicine when and where they need it.

Some of our best work is done in working with patients to achieve better health and ultimately to avoid a hospital stay. Outpatient treatment, better emergency care and family medicine are synonymous with the best medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital. We take great pride in our patient education and outreach programs that target community needs and special populations.

THE BEST DEFENSE

Prevention is the best medicine of all. Invariably, it is a function of education — of making knowledge accessible and useful to our patients and their families.

Mount Sinai's commitment to education is two-fold: professional and public. On the professional front, we are one of Canada's leading teaching hospitals. As such, we are an educational centre for a wide range of health care professionals. In addition, we are affiliated with the University of Toronto's esteemed Faculty of Medicine, a relationship that began in 1956.

Mount Sinai's public education programs reach hundreds of thousands of consumers through a variety of media — TV, publications and presentations — with health and wellness information they can use.

THE BEST MEDICINE

How is Mount Sinai meeting the health care challenges of our time?

With a focused agenda. Science-based solutions. Uncompromising care. Early intervention. In short, these are the means by which Mount Sinai will continue to deliver what it has provided to its patients and the community since 1923:

The best medicine.

Foundations For Life

At Mount Sinai Hospital, we believe that the best medicine is built on strong foundations. Our Foundations For Life initiative is premised on the belief that we can all participate in building this great hospital and improving health care for future generations.

Anti-racism education experiencing 'backlash'

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Anti-racist education has come a long way since 1981, but it still has far to go, Karen Mock recently told a B'nai Brith Canada League for Human Rights symposium in Winnipeg.

Mock, the League's national director and a longtime anti-racist educator, recalled what an isolated and marginal endeavor anti-racist ecucation was prior to the first National Education Symposium in 1981, which also took place in Winnipeg.

"Before 1981, you couldn't use the 'R' word and get funded," she said. "Now we are seeing a backlash. People want to softpedal the issue. We are here to develop practical strategies to combat the 'isms.' We have to get away from turf wars and arguments over who gets credit for what. We have to break down the barriers to real equality rather then just grab power."

Mock gave a brief history of the development of anti-racist education from the 1970s, when Canada developed an official policy of multiculturalism. She cited landmark reports along the way including a study by Walter Pittman following racial incidents in Toronto, and other studies that documented discrimination against people of color and aboriginal people.

"We provided the data that supported the perceptions of discrimination," Mock said. "We put out race relations training manuals and lobbied for equity policies. If we as researchers are becoming discouraged by the attitudes of the '90s, how much worse is it for minority youth. They are angry and feel betrayed. No one should be surprised that they are turning to violence."

She attributed the current backlash to the depressed economic climate. Governments are using the excuse of fiscal restraint to cut support for equal opportunity hiring, she noted. As well, when someone is worried about losing his job, he tends to become self-centred.

Hard economic times also lead people to look to minority populations as scapegoats, and the rise of the move to the right worldwide emboldens local racists.

"Our studies show that about 15 percent of the population is bigoted." Mock reported. "The good news is that up to 70 percent of Canadians support multiculturalism and anti-racist legislation. The key is the remaining 15 percent who will go either way. They can be won over by someone who takes off his hood and puts on a suit to run for office. Wolfgang Droege only received 3,000 votes in Scarborough, but how many other people agreed with him even though they didn't vote for him?"

Mock is also concerned about fractiousness between minority groups. She described the term "special interest groups" as a "travesty." We are all Canadians and we all have to work together to build a society based on multiculturalism, equality and social justice, she said.

"We are at a crossroads," she said, "but I am an optimist. We wouldn't be experiencing a backlash if we weren't making progress. It is time to put words into action."

Following Mock's call for action, Helmut-Harry Loewen, the Winnipeg-based research director of the Western Anti-Racist Network (WARN) gave concrete examples of successful action taken to oppose racists.

Loewen distinguished between exposing racists and opposing them. Exposure, he explained, involves intelligence and information gathering on a number of levels, monitoring and tracking racists and building coalitions with other anti-racist groups.

"Information flows freely among anti-racist groups across Canada," he said. "Once racists are exposed, they can then be opposed and even deposed."

As an example, he noted the case of Aryan Nations leader Charles Scott, who has already been forced out of several British Columbia communities due to exposure by anti-racists.

"We have to be creative and flexible," Loewen said. "We have to match strategies to the situation. We can oppose hate through education, legal action and confrontation. We can shut down racist meetings and pressure hotel owners not to rent rooms to racists. The time to expose and oppose hatemongers is now more than ever."

Loewen and Mock were joined on the panel by Laara Fitznor, a Metis professor in the Faculty of Education at the University of Manitoba, and Winnipeg city councillor Glen Murray, who is gay.

The symposium also included sessions on Holocaust education and countering hate on the Internet. The keynote speaker over lunch was Ken McVay of Vancouver Island, the creator of the Nizkor Project to fight anti-Semitism and hate on the Internet.

Vancouver community leader to be honored by Israel Bonds

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A leading member of Vancouver's Jewish community, Morris J. Wosk, will be among those honored by State of Israel Bonds at a recognition ceremony in Jerusalem in April.

Wosk is one of 36 selected from around the world "to recognize continuing and longstanding support of Israel, Israel Bonds and the community in which he lives," says the Bonds office.

Norman Franks, Western Canada executive director of Israel Bonds, says the recognition ceremony will be the "centrepiece" of Bonds' Jerusalem 3000 delegation to Israel, April 17 to 25.

The celebration will conclude on Yom Ha'atzmaut, with festivities including naval and air demonstrations and a performance at the new Tel Aviv opera house.

At the recognition ceremony, the Wosk family and the others being honored will have family scrolls containing their genealogy and list of community achievements placed in an Israel Bonds time capsule, which will be buried in the gardens of the King David Hotel overlooking the old city.

The Wosk family will be honored by Bonds locally at a tribute evening on June 18.

Quebec judge expresses regret over comments

By DON MACDONALD
Special to The CJN

QUEBEC CITY — A Quebec Superior Court judge, who shocked the province's Jewish community by suggesting Nazi gas-chamber victims didn't suffer, now says the statement was the result of an "unfortunate comparison" of a crime with suicide by carbon monoxide poisoning.

Justice Jean Bienvenue reiterated his regret for the concentration camp comments during two days of testimony April 3 and 4, before a Canadian Judicial Council disciplinary hearing into his conduct.

"I visited Auschwitz with horror and if anyone knows what the Jews suffered during the last war, it's me," Bienvenue, 67, told the five-judge panel hearing his case at the Quebec City courthouse.

The judge made the gas-chamber comment last December in sentencing Tracy Theberge, who had been convicted of slashing the throat of estranged husband Simon Messier.

Bienvenue's sentencing statement sparked outrage among Jewish and women's groups. He told Theberge that Jews who died in the gas chambers did not suffer as much as her victim. He added that women, while the nobler of the sexes, could act with more depravity than the vilest man.

Bienvenue explained before the hearing that he was thinking of suicides by carbon monoxide poisoning when he made the Holocaust allusion.

"The gas chamber — this part of the death, this part of what they suffered — was less cruel than what Simon Messier suffered in terms of physical pain," he said. "When there is a suicide in a garage by someone blocking the tailpipe of their car, the police will tell you the death is the gentlest possible. You don't feel anything. You just go."

But Bienvenue quickly added he regretted having made the comparison and noted he had expressed his sincere apologies in a meeting with leaders of the Jewish community in Montreal in December.

"[The statement] was unfortunate, inappropriate," Bienvenue said under questioning from his lawyer, Gabriel Lapointe.

But Bienvenue's regret about his statement at the Theberge trial stopped with the one regarding the Holocaust. He said he stood by his comments about women, although he allowed that women have made great strides and singled out former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir as someone he respects.

And Lapointe may have made things worse for Bienvenue by shocking women's groups anew with his aggressive questioning of a female television reporter who testified against Bienvenue at the hearing.

Valerie Lesage, a journalist with the TVA network who covered the Theberge trial, testified that Bienvenue had made a suggestive comment to her in a hallway outside the courtroom that included a reference to her skirt.

Lapointe asked Lesage a series of questions about her height and weight and the length of her skirt, with the suggestion that her apparel had been destracting to jurors.

At one point, the lawyer asked Lesage if her skirt had been a "rase-trou," a vulgar French expression for a skirt that just covers the crotch area.

The question drew complaints from groups representing women, lawyers and journalists.

The Judicial Council hearing was called at the request of federal Justice Minister Allan Rock and his provincial counterpart Paul Begin.

The panel, which could recommend that Bienvenue be removed from the bench, will hear lawyers' final arguments on April 19.

Winnipeg BGU set to honor cancer researcher

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University will honor Dr. Lyonel Israels, one of Canada's leading cancer researchers, at a tribute dinner on April 21, at the Westin Hotel.

For 20 years, Israels served as executive director of the Manitoba Cancer Treatment Research Foundation. He has also served as president of the National Cancer Institute of Canada, the Canadian Society of Clinical Investigation and the Canadian Society of Hematology and chair of the Scientific Advisory Council of the International Agency for Research on Cancer based in Lyon, France.

He retired from his position at the Manitoba Cancer Treatment Research Foundation in 1992 to return full time to research.

Previous honors that Israels has received include the Order of Canada, the St. Boniface Humanitarian Award, Captain of the Order of the Buffalo Hunt of the Province of Manitoba and the Distinguished Service Award of the Manitoba Medical Association.

At the Ben-Gurion dinner, Israels will be presented with the Negev Award, Ben-Gurion University of the Negev's highest award. A chair in Hematology will be established at the university's medical school in his name.

CJC-Q seeks written promise on Passover foods

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The furor over some Passover foods being pulled off shelves subsided when the Office de la Langue Française (OLF) pledged that it won't happen again next year.

But Jewish community officials made it clear after a two-hour meeting with OLF officials last Friday that they want a written guarantee that Passover goods will be exempted for good.

"We are looking for a long-term solution, a written policy that will be publicized," Reisa Teitelbaum, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), told The CJN. "It's not good enough just to say it.

"The ultimate goal is to make sure that there is a process put into place, that it never happens again."

The meeting with the OLF, which included Montreal Sephardi leadership, capped a week in which the controversy — dubbed "Matzohgate" by one wag — seemed to take on a life of its own.

The story dominated the front page of the Gazette for five out of six days and even made the pages of the Los Angeles Times.

The OLF's actions also triggered widespread condemnation and charges of intolerance from Quebec pundits and interest groups of all political stripes.

They included Alliance Quebec, the Montreal Board of Trade and even ardent sovereigntists and supporters of Quebec French-language laws, who accused the OLF of demonstrating extreme heavy-handedness when it warned Quebec food distributors in a letter to "act quickly," just as Jews were stocking up for Passover.

At a press conference last Friday, the two sides announced the formation of a task force to find a permanent solution to the problem.

OLF officials conceded that they had no way of knowing whether a member of the Sephardi community had, in fact, registered a complaint, since the OLF does not keep records on the religious identity of complainants.

But OLF president Nicole René and communications director Gilles-Louis Racine also suggested that the OLF's letter was "misinterpreted" — a defence rejected outright by Teitelbaum as disingenuous — and refused to explicitly apologize for its actions.

While René allowed that, "in hindsight, it's obvious that the Jewish community felt it was being targeted" and that it "may not have been the best time to pursue the dossier," she insisted they were targeting Passover food importers, not the Jewish community, for "not complying with the law."

Whether that, in fact, was the case, remains a crucial point of contention between the two sides.

The CJC-Q says that besides a "tacit" agreement between the Jewish community and successive Quebec governments over the last decade exempting Passover products from French-language labelling requirements, it also exists in fact.

A regulation in the French Language Charter says that non-French-labelled products are allowed into Quebec when they are "in very limited use and no equivalent replacement products presented in French exists on the Quebec market."

Racine, however, maintained that the term "limited use" does not apply to Passover goods because they are available in supermarkets, for a community of 100,000 members.

"We will have to find a definition we can all agree on," René said.

Under federal bilingual labelling guidelines, imported Passover products are classified as "specialty" foods and are exempted across Canada from the law requiring English and French on food packaging.

Teitelbaum told The CJN that if there is no solution, the Jewish community might have to seek recourse through the courts.

Israel Forum looks to future

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Israel Forum, a consortium of Vancouver agencies and organizations, has been set up to discuss and plan "how our relationship and active demonstration of partnership with Israel will evolve over the next several years," says an article in the latest issue of Federation, published by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

The Forum is a response to a speech made in Washington D.C. in February by Israel Foreign Minister Ehud Barak. At the time Barak said Israel and the Diaspora represent two separate systems founded on common traditions and values.

Barak acknowledged the importance of Diaspora Jewry's support in the international arena in the area of security and economic standing, but emphasized that Israel's decisions would continue to be made by its own elected leaders. And he called for "sincere openness in dialogue and consultations between the two communities."

While the Diaspora and the State of Israel "reconsider their historical relationship and develop a new model for the second 50 years of statehood, our community-based agencies are engaged in the same discussions," said the federation article. The Forum wants to develop a concrete approach to continuing a strong relationship, especially between youth movements from Israel and the Diaspora and expansion of Hebrew studies among youth in the Diaspora. A two-year plan is being developed to establish a local policy which will be announced in June.

Still in its formative stage, the Israel Forum includes Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region, Aliyah Centre, Canadian Israel Program Centre, Canadian Zionist Federation, JFGV, Jewish Community Centre, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, Hadassah-WIZO of Vancouver, and Jewish National Fund. Morris Soronow is coordinating the group's activities through the Congress office.

Projects the Forum is working on as an initial effort include preparing an inventory of current Israel-content programs in Vancouver; working with the Canadian Zionist Federation as the lead agency in this year's Walk With Israel honoring Jerusalem 3000; planning a program of Israel-content activities for the next two years leading to the 50th anniversary of Israel.

JFGV executive director Drew Staffenberg has been asked by the group to undertake staff planning.

Rose Fund to reflect leader's varied interests

MONTREAL — Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy will inaugurate the Alan Rose Fund for International Human Dignity, an annual program honoring the memory of the former Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) executive vice-president who died last July.

Axworthy will give an address May 14 at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim on The New State of Arab-Israel Relations in Light of the Middle East Peace Process: A Canadian Perspective, a topic chosen by Rose's wife, Joyce. The event is open to the public at no charge.

The evening will also include responses by Jewish and Arab speakers, to be announced later.

The date marks one year to the day that Rose accepted the Samuel Bronfman Medal at CJC's Plenary Assembly.

A committee, chaired by Rabbi Howard Joseph, is trying to raise $75,000 for the fund, which will sponsor an event or project each year that reflects Rose's wide range of interests, related to world Jewry and international affairs in general.

It might support publications, relief shipments to needy communities, lectures not only in Montreal but elsewhere in Canada, or other "creative options" that will put into practice Rose's vision of human rights and social justice.

Mike Cohen, the CJC staff member coordinating the fundraising, said almost half of the goal has been reached after only a month of campaigning.

Rabbi Joseph noted that there are untold numbers of people whose lives were touched by Rose, who admired him and who learned much from him.

Rose retired in 1994 after a 25-year career with CJC for which he travelled around the world, on behalf of oppressed communities, Holocaust survivors seeking reparations, to promote human rights at international events, and interfaith dialogue.

He was appointed to the federal Immigration and Refugee Board, but became ill soon after, dying at age 73.

There are four donor categories: Patrons ($1,000 and over), Sponsors ($500-$999), Friends ($100-$499) and Contributors. A tax receipt will be issued.

For information, call Cohen, 514-931-7531.

Rabin's daughter to help launch scholarship fund

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CHFU) is participating in the establishment of the Rabin Scholarship Fund for the Advancement of Peace, as a memorial to the assassinated Israeli prime minister.

Rabin's daughter, Dalia Rabin Pelossof, will be here in July to help launch the national project. She will be principal speaker at a "garden party by the sea," says Dvori Balshine, director of the CHFU Pacific region.

The scholarships will be set up through an endowment fund "that will allow students of all races and religions to pursue the ideals for which Yitzhak Rabin gave his life," according to CHFU.

The region's newsletter, Between Friends, says the fund will serve the dual purpose of promoting the pursuit of peace at an international level and focusing world attention on the role Yitzhak Rabin played in helping bring peace to the Middle East.

The fund will feature two components. Each year, based on outstanding research and/or involvement in the study of world peace, a scholar of international acclaim will be named a Rabin Scholar and given financial support to continue the studies at the Hebrew University. In addition, the balance of the revenue generated annually from the fund will be awarded as scholarships to study at Hebrew University.

At least one scholarship a year will be made available to a Canadian student. Scholarships will go to graduates of political science, international relations, economics, law or other areas relating to the study of peace.

Turbulence not always part of adolescence

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Adolescence is not necessarily a time of acute and sustained upheaval, and of fluctuating and uncontrolled hormones, according to recent research studies.

Also contrary to popular myth, two adolescent psychiatrists told the annual health education lecture of the Mount Sinai Hospital auxiliary, the absence of turbulence is not necessarily unhealthy.

Dr. Randy Gangbar, a psychiatrist and marital and family therapist, staff physician at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, Queen Street Mental Health Centre and Toronto Hospital, and consultant psychiatrist to Jewish Family and Child Service, and Dr. Douglas Weir, a child psychiatrist, psychoanalyst and staff physician at the Hospital for Sick Children, noted that nevertheless the teenagers years are ones of challenge.

There are biological changes in every system in the body, Weir said. As well, youngsters must adapt to other changes such as emotional swings, the formation of a new identity, sexual maturity, the preparation for an occupation, family life, and the internalization of a system of ethical values.

Nevertheless, a recent long-term study done in Chicago suggests that in only 23 percent of adolescents is there serious turbulence. The rest have either minor psychological upheavals, or a fairly smooth time of it.

Stable environment cited

Interestingly enough, the study indicates that the more stable the environment in which the teenager lives, the calmer will be his or her passage through adolescence.

Those with serious problems, such as suicidal inclinations and drug abuse, in adolescence, Weir added, tend to carry them into adulthood.

Teens receiving psychological or psychiatric help, said Weir, tend to have a high drop-out rate. "They are reluctant to see themselves or others as having problems."

At this age, group therapies may be more successful, he suggested.

Gangbar advised parents dealing with adolescents that for teens, saving face is extremely important.

"Choose your fights carefully. It is a sign of maturity to be able to lose a fight. Remember too that teenagers respond well to fights as a way to be close."

Adolescence is a difficult time for parents, Gangbar said. It is a time of coming to terms with the grief inherent in their children's growing independence, with the fact that wishes both for the children and themselves will not come true, and dealing with a culture that prizes youth and has an "iffy" relation with middle age and the elderly.

Many adults deal with the situation badly; with a refusal to hear what their kids are saying and a "what was good for me is good for them attitude; so strong a desire to avoid the mistakes of their parents that they have difficulty in setting necessary limits; dreading the coming of adolescence, which produces a self-fulfilling expectation of trouble; and an effort to relive their own adolescence."

Gangbar advised being "authoritative parents, rather than authoritarian ones. That is more successful."

He also denigrated the myth that dysfunctional teenagers always come from dysfunctional families. "Experts forget that a dysfunctional teenager can cause extreme stress to an otherwise healthy family."

Specialist visiting Jordan

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Arnold Noyek, otolaryngologist-in-chief of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, is in Amman this week, trying to establish ongoing relations between leading figures in the Jordanian and Israeli medical establishments.

Before he left Toronto, Noyek told The CJN he hopes to "build future collaboration on the success of the first collaboration, a scientific day dealing with contemporary otolaryngology in the Middle East."

Under the auspices of the Isabel Silverman Canada-International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO), of which Noyek is executive director, that gathering was the first international Canada-Israel-Jordan effort in the medical field, Noyek said.

Representatives from Toronto, Montreal, Israel and Jordan attended that first meeting, which dealt with problems common to the area, such as cancer of the naso-pharynx and hearing loss in children.

Residents of northern Israel cope with Katyushas

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

KIRYAT SHMONA – Shoval has spent most of his life inside a single room with reinforced concrete walls. The only time the newborn infant from Kiryat Shmona has been out of that room was last Saturday, when he was taken to a public bomb shelter to be circumcized.

Yigal and Anat Goredesh stayed in Kiryat Shmona just long enough to hold the brit milah of Shoval, their firstborn son. Then, like thousands of other residents of this northern town that has taken the brunt of the Katyusha rocket attacks over the last week, they sought refuge farther south.

"We would have left sooner, but we wanted to hold Shoval's brit on Saturday – eight days after his birth," explains 28-year-old Goredesh.

Not all of those invited arrived. Many had already fled Kiryat Shmona. Those who came had to strain to hear the mohel's blessing recited against the sound of IDF tanks pounding targets in southern Lebanon.

Goredesh couldn't bear to keep his son in a bomb shelter. "It's too suffocating and cold for a newborn baby," he says. "Instead we put him in the 'security room' of our home, which has reinforced concrete walls. It's about 98 percent as safe as a shelter. For the other two percent, we relied on the Almighty."

But the day after the ceremony, the Gorodeshes left Kiryat Shmona to stay with friends in the Golan. They were not alone. More than two-thirds of Kiryat Shmona's 18,000 residents have left town, many through an organized evacuation, since the start of the IDF military operation in Lebanon.

"When you have several young children, you can't afford to be patriotic," says Tami Husrabi, who took her four children, aged five, three, two and nine months, to stay with relatives in Jerusalem.

By leaving Kiryat Shmona, Husrabi hoped to spare her children undue suffering. But growing up in Kiryat Shmona has already left its mark on them.

Five-year-old Dor tells this reporter he's frightened. "My friend's house was blown up by a Katyusha. The next one might fall on our house. I'm scared," he says. "I'm scared," and repeats the words again and again.

"Sometimes I wonder if I've done the right thing by building a home and raising a family in Kiryat Shmona," admits Husrabi.

"What can I do? My family is here. My roots are here. And I love this place. Not that we could afford to live anywhere else. If we sold our house, we couldn't use the money to buy even half a room in Jerusalem.

Husrabi doesn't want to talk politics. She is beginning to doubt whether any political party can guarantee her family's safety.

"After the 1982 Peace for Galilee operation, we were sure that we'd seen the last Katyusha rockets in Kiryat Shmona. Then in 1993, Operation Accountability gave us a few months of tranquility. But here we are back again in the same position. Last month the windows were blown right out of our house. I'm beginning to think that this is the way we are always going to live."

In the meantime, in an ironic twist of fate, Husrabi is waiting out this latest border flareup at the home of her sister Ruthi in Jerusalem.

Just over a month ago, Ruthi, a kindergarten teacher in the city's Katamonim neighborhood, found refuge at her sister's home in Kiryat Shmona. Ruthi and her husband were in shock following the death of her husband's cousin in the Bus #18 suicide bombing in the Katamonim.

While Husrabi waited out the danger in Jerusalem, Marina Lekin and her two children spent every night sleeping in a bomb shelter. Lekin and her husband Vladimir, new immigrants from Russia, live on Kibbutz Manara, which straddles the Lebanese border. They are among the many residents of northern communities who stayed in their homes despite the threat of Katyusha rockets. "If I left, I would just worry about everyone else all the time," says Marina Lekin, a chemistry teacher.

Vladimir refuses to sleep in the bomb shelter. So every night Marina, who is pregnant, takes the children into the subterranean shelter.

"Unless you've spent time in a bomb shelter, you don't know the feeling it evokes," she says. "There's a distinct smell that sickens some people. There's the feeling of being buried underground.

"But then you develop a certain mind set. For me, it's like a state of hypnosis in which I just keep repeating to myself that it's going to be over soon."

From her living room window, Marina Lekin can wave to Lebanese villagers. "They are in the same boat as we are," she says. "Often the Katyusha rockets launched by the Hezbollah fall short of their target and land in those villages. I know some of the residents there. One of them tends the gardens at the college where I work. Every day I bid him shalom, and he bids me salaam. He is as much a victim as we are."

Members of an Israeli artillery crew carry 155mm shells toward their gun as shelling into Lebanon continued in retaliation for Katyusha rocket attacks into the northern Galilee. [RNS photo]

Like most residents of the north, Lekin is relieved that the IDF took action against the Hezbollah in Lebanon. But she keeps thinking about the Lebanese villagers further north.

"I know it's impossible to take military action without some civilian casualties. But Lebanese civilians are paying a very high price. It pains me."

When fighting in Lebanon flared up three years ago, the Lekins sent their children south for safety. "But it was too difficult being apart," says Marina. "So this time we decided to stay together as long as we can."

Has Lekin ever thought of leaving this border kibbutz to live in a safer place? The college where she teaches, Tel Hai, is where the legendary Zionist hero Yosef Trumpeldor died fending off Arab attackers in 1920. The lesson is not lost on Lekin, who may have spent most of her life in Leningrad but has absorbed the spirit of Zionism in her five years in Israel.

"At the very beginning I asked myself that question: Should I stay or go?

"It's the one that Yosef Trumpeldor must have asked: Is it worth it? There are people at this kibbutz who are models for me – people who have endured a lifetime of struggle. So now I no longer ask that question. It's clear to me: I am here to stay."

Lebanon — a case of deja vu

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

A sense of dread and deja vu settled over southern Lebanon this week as Israel and Hezbollah traded tit-for-tat blows in the most serious fighting there in at least several years.

Mideast Analysis

In a virtual replay of Operation Accountability (July 1993), Israel pounded Hezbollah bases by air, by land and by sea, striking Beirut for the first time since the 1982 Lebanon War. Hezbollah hit back, forcing civilians into bomb shelters, prompting Israel to partially evacuate Kiryat Shmona, Metulla and other settlements in the affected area, and sending about 400,000 Lebanese fleeing northward.

Significantly, Syria remained aloof from the fray, despite having condemned Israel and having lost a soldier following an Israeli air strike near the Lebanese capital.

Israel intensified its assault, dubbed Operation Grapes of Wrath, as The Canadian Jewish News went to press on April 15. Prime Minister Shimon Peres said there were no immediate plans to halt the raids, which so far have involved neither Israeli ground troops nor armor.

Israel's chief objective is to force Lebanon and Syria to crack down on Hezbollah, which of late has shelled the Galilee with Katyusha rockets in a breach of its informal understanding with Israel, reached after Operation Accountability.

That agreement, brokered by the United States with Syria's and Iran's cooperation, collapsed for two reasons: Hezbollah has rocketed northern Israel, injuring 26 Israelis since March 30, and stepped up its attacks against Israel's self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon, slaying seven Israeli soldiers since January.

Hezbollah, an Islamic fundamentalist group supported by Syria and Iran, claimed that Israel started the latest round by killing several Lebanese civilians north of the security enclave. Israel apologized for the casualties, saying they were unintended.

Israel has been fighting a war of attrition with Hezbollah since 1985, when the Israeli army withdrew from all of Lebanon, except for a strip of rugged terrain adjacent to its frontier, and created the security enclave to protect its border against hostile infiltrations, initiated by the PLO in 1968.

During the late 1960s, 1970s and early 1980s, when the chief enemy was the PLO, Israel launched two invasions (Operation Litani and Operation Peace for Galilee) and innumerable raids into Lebanon.

In June 1978, following Operation Litani, the United Nations passed a resolution urging Israel to vacate Lebanon. Israel has not complied with the resolution because Lebanon — a protectorate of Syria — lacks the will and the military strength to disarm militias like Hezbollah.

Only Syria has the capability, though obviously not the will, to clamp down on Hezbollah. Syria has been using Hezbollah to pressure Israel to beat a hasty retreat from Lebanon (which Damascus regards as its legitimate sphere of influence) and from the Golan Heights. Last month, Israel suspended talks with Syria over the Golan, saying they would not resume until Syria reins in Hezbollah, which has grown increasingly brazen.

Israel has no territorial designs on Lebanon, though Arab commentators claim it covets the waters of the Litani River. In the past two years, Israel has declared a willingness to withdraw from southern Lebanon, provided its security can be assured. But the weak Lebanese government has rejected these proposals and called for an unconditional Israeli withdrawal, a non-starter as far as Israel is concerned.

The Week in Israel

April 8

• Ha'aretz reported that Israel and the NATO alliance had agreed to hold a forum to study the possibilities of joint scientific projects. The announcement came as a result of a meeting in Brussels last week between a delegation from Israel of Foreign and Defence Ministry officials with the NATO secretariat.

April 9

• Ha'aretz reported that Prime Minister Shimon Peres will sign a joint defence agreement with the United States against unconventional warfare at the end of the month in Washington.

• Degel Hatorah and Agudat Yisrael arrived at an agreement to present a joint electoral list for the May 29 elections. The first five places on the list will be held by Agudat Yisrael (1-3-5) and Degel Hatorah (2-4).

April 10

• The Jerusalem Post reported that Miriam Goldstein of Kiryat Arba, the widow of Baruch Goldstein, had appealed to the Tel Aviv district court against the refusal by the Ministry of Defence to recognize her as the survivor of a terrorist victim. In her appeal, she argued that her husband was murdered by Arabs after they had disarmed him and thus they deprived him of the right to be tried by the law.

April 11

• Midnight was the deadline for the submission of party lists for the upcoming elections. Twenty-four party lists will be vying for votes on May 29.

• Sofia Landver, a new immigrant from the former Soviet Union, was elected by a large majority to the 25th position on Labor's election list.

April 12

• Ha'aretz reported disagreement between the Shin Bet (General Security Service) and the IDF Intelligence Office on the question of primary responsibility for the gathering and assessment of intelligence data from the West Bank areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority. The issue reportedly arose because Ami Ayalon, head of the Shin Bet as well as head of the recently created terror fighting unit, is seeking to centralize the key intelligence aspects of Israel's fight against terrorism.

Pressure mounts on Lebanon

and dozens of villages south of the Litani River. The coastal road leading to Beirut was reported to be completely blocked with traffic.

According to reports from Lebanon, about 200 villages had been evacuated by last Sunday night, including most of Tyre which has a population of nearly 60,000.

Reports from Lebanon said that one Katyusha hit inside the UN peacekeeping force base in Nakura causing extensive damage, but no injuries.

"The fire in many instances comes from inside the village. They keep the rockets inside houses, take them out and fire, then return to the house. We saw them fire from a school and other public buildings," said Shahak.

He said the IDF's call for all residents in southern Lebanon to flee northward is meant to keep them from being hurt. "We hope the exodus will prevent civilians from being harmed. We will continue to act wherever Hezbollah can be found. We won't let Hezbollah hide among civilians or use the residents of south Lebanon as a shield," he said.

OC Intelligence Maj.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon said his people had information Hezbollah is trying to carry out suicide attacks in the security zone and that it may even try to infiltrate Israel with a terrorist flying a hang glider. He said that Israeli and Jewish targets abroad are also on alert against possible attacks by Hezbollah, which is being aided by Iran.

Ya'alon also said diplomats at the Iranian Embassy in Beirut had fled to Damascus, apparently seeking to avoid being targeted by Israel.

Hezbollah's Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, meanwhile, again indicated the organization would not confine its retaliatory activities to Lebanon and northern Israel. He strongly intimated that it would also hit Israel and Jewish targets abroad.

Despite repeated Israeli strikes, Hezbollah units still responded last Sunday by firing some 45 rockets at the Galilee panhandle and western Galilee.

The Katyushas caused only light damage, and only three injuries were reported.

The low casualty figure was in part attributed to the fact that residents of northern Israeli communities had heeded army directives to remain in bomb shelters and security rooms.

Another factor was that many homes were empty, after thousands of northern residents fled to central and southern Israel shortly after the hostilities broke out.

On Sunday night, one Katyusha rocket hit a shelter housing scores of people, but only two were lightly hurt.

Overall, more than 500 apartments had sustained damage in the wave of rocket attacks which began last week.

The Israeli military operation began April 11, after the Passover holiday, when Israel launched air operations that extended to the southern suburbs of Beirut for a surgical strike against what was described as the logistics centre of Hezbollah.

It marked the first time Israel targeted the Lebanese capital since the 1982 war in Lebanon.

Last week, the IDF issued a statement advising Lebanese civilians to leave four villages in southern Lebanon that Israel charged were being used by Hezbollah fighters as bases.

On Sunday, the IDF extended the warning to Lebanese residents of more than 42 villages south of the Litani River, telling them to get out of the area or risk their lives.

In addition to the artillery and air strikes, Israel imposed a naval blockade on Lebanon.

On Saturday, an Israeli helicopter rocketed an ambulance near Tyre, killing four children and two women, sources in Lebanon said. Israel said a member of Hezbollah had also been travelling in the vehicle.

On Sunday, Israeli planes rocketed a relay station in Jamhour, located south of Beirut, knocking out power in the surrounding area.

Israel said the raid was in response to a Hezbollah rocket attack the previous night that had knocked out electricity in the northern Israeli border town of Kiryat Shmona.

"No place is immune," Peres told Israel Radio. "If they will hit electricity in our places, their electricity will face the same problem."

The air force also hit two targets in the Bekaa Valley which it said served Hezbollah for transmitting its "Voice of the Oppressed" radio station.

The United States has given its support to the Israeli strikes in Lebanon.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher said over the weekend that the Israeli actions were a legitimate response to Hezbollah's rocket attacks on northern Israel.

Islamic groups promise new suicide attacks

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Hezbollah called on all of its suicide attackers last Sunday to take up their positions.

"Due to the developments, we call the martyrs' brigade to join their predetermined posts and we call for general mobilization in the ranks of Hezbollah," Hezbollah chief Hassan Nasrallah said in a statement on television.

Last month, a Hezbollah suicide attacker blew himself up near an IDF patrol in south Lebanon, killing a soldier and wounding five.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad issued a joint statement in Beirut last Saturday vowing to renew suicide attacks against Israel. "Our heroic suicide attackers will strike deep in the Zionist depth. Let the enemy and its allies know that its crimes and terrorism against our innocent and unarmed people in Lebanon will not pass without punishment," the statement said.

The Palestinian Authority (PA) has condemned the operation against Hezbollah, saying it has killed dozens of innocent people and threatens the peace process.

Meanwhile, the PA has released "dozens" of arrested suspected Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists after deciding they were not involved in planning suicide attacks against Israelis or attacks on the PA, spokesperson Mohammed Abu Shanab said last Saturday.

"More prisoners will be released and those who are shown to have been involved will be sent to the public prosecutor and tried," he said.

Until this week, the Palestinian police were holding an estimated 900 Hamas and Islamic Jihad prisoners who were arrested after the four suicide bombings.

Israel, Syria at odds

by STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Iran and Syria are at odds over whether Hezbollah should continue Katyusha attacks on northern Israel, informed sources said Saturday night.

The sources said that Iran has been encouraging Hezbollah to escalate tensions in south Lebanon by repeated Katyusha attacks, while Syria has been seeking to restrain them.

Hezbollah, which has been receiving increased funds from Iran, has chosen to ignore Syria's advice, the sources said.

The result, the sources said, is that Hezbollah, which has been storing massive amounts of ammunition and rockets over the past few months, has been able to fire at will on towns in northern Israel without permission from Syria.

The Get: Use and Abuse

PART 2 OF 2

In the April 4 issue, we examined Get abuse and the ostracization that can result for the victimized spouse. In response, with an extremely rare display of total unity among all the different Jewish organizations and many secular organizations in 1986 and 1991, a Holy coalition convinced the new Democratic and Conservative parties to outvote the Provincial Liberal minority government and its Justice committee (the only time this has ever happened on a Canadian government bill) to pass remedial legislation. The legislation gives a secular Judge the authority to prevent a spouse from pleading or defending a family law action in the Canadian court system. The Liberals also introduced their own amendments that make it difficult to bargain for a Get (agreements can be set aside if that happens).

A few years later, the federal government passed similar provisions in the Divorce Act with the unanimous support of all organized religious institutions and faiths across Canada.

The federal government released a study in June 1992 in which they reviewed the effectiveness of the Get provisions of the Divorce Act. The cross-country survey concluded that since the legislation had come into effect, "an increasing number of Jewish spouses in Canada seeking a divorce no longer utilize the Get as a bargaining tool to obtain financial or custodial gain to which they are not legally entitled." The study further concluded that the legislation provides "some protection from victimized spouses, whereby a recalcitrant spouse is prevented from using the Get as a lever against the spouse and children." The survey also disclosed that 61% of the people who were polled (Rabbis, lawyers, social workers, and other experts) felt that the problem had been substantially diminished as a direct result of the Get legislation.

I don't mean to suggest that the Get problem has disappeared in Canada. Many would like to see the problem solved rabbinically and feel that the secular remedies are only a "band-aid" solution until a religious remedy is found.

However, as the community attempts to move further in solving this problem, both in Canada and internationally, we should take a moment to reflect on what the Jewish community has achieved to date in Ontario and in this country. Internationally, New York State and Israel have now passed similar legislation. Australia is on the brink of following the Canadian example, and England is debating remedial legislation as well.

Palestine Council prepares to amend its charter

By JON IMMANUEL and NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM - Salim Zaanoun, acting chair of the Palestine National Council (PNC), said last week that the historic meeting to change the Palestinian charter is planned for April 22.

Speaking from Amman where he was meeting PNC members, Zaanoun told Palestine Radio that "President Arafat called me last night and told me to send the invitations to the PNC members and to prepare all documents needed to convene the session on April 22."

Arafat is chairman of the PLO executive committee that must call the meeting.

Zaanoun added that the meeting, which according to the Oslo 2 timetable must be held by May 7, could be postponed or held in Cairo if Israel failed to provide permits for 86 PNC members who have not yet received them.

"The PNC plans a new national charter instead of the old one," Zaanoun said. He did not say whether the old charter would be explicitly annulled, as required by the terms of the Oslo agreement. The new 17-article charter, largely written, refers to a Palestinian state next to Israel with neighborly relations.

Meanwhile, council member Leila Khaled, a Palestinian terrorist known for her involvement in the 1969 hijacking of a TWA airliner, has been barred by Israel from entering the West Bank.

Khaled had received permission to attend the PNC meeting on April 22. But Israeli officials said she was refused entry Sunday at the Allenby Bridge crossing from Jordan because they were not informed in advance of her arrival.

Israel has demanded that PNC members sign a pledge denouncing terror and expressing support for the peace process as a precondition for obtaining permission to enter the territories.

Israeli officials say that some 250 of the PNC members who live outside the Gaza Strip and West Bank have already received entry permits and about 200 have already arrived for the meeting.

Hezbollah in ambulance

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

KIRYAT SHMONA – IDF Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak defended last Saturday's missile attack on an ambulance, which reportedly killed three children and two women in south Lebanon, saying Hezbollah fighters were trying to hide behind any innocent shield they could find.

Reports from Lebanon said an Israel Air Force (IAF) helicopter fired at an ambulance travelling on a road southeast of the port city of Tyre. Besides the dead, two men were injured in the attack near the village of Hinniyeh, the reports said.

Shahak confirmed that the IAF hit a vehicle south of Tyre, but said it contained a Hezbollah fighter and was moving in an area where Katyushas had been fired earlier.

"We hit a vehicle south of Tyre, in an area where we told civilians to flee because the Hezbollah was operating there," Shahak said. "Civilians were not supposed to be in this area.

"The Hezbollah are afraid to move and are looking for any way to try to look like innocent people.

"We will continue to hit the villages from which Katyushas are fired. Civilians are not supposed to be there and we have called upon them again to leave the area. We will allow anyone moving northward to do so freely and safely. Any vehicle moving between Hezbollah positions will be hit," Shahak said.

Lebanese security sources told the Associated Press that the ambulance belonged to the Islamic Message Scouts, an affiliate of one of the Shi'ite political groups.

The ambulance was hit just after it drove past a checkpoint of Fijian troops of the UN peacekeeping force.

Hi-tech weapons used by IDF

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The IDF is using hi-tech artillery to score direct hits on Hezbollah's Katyusha rocket launchers, the commander of IDF artillery forces in the north said last week.

He said there had been at least three confirmed direct hits on launchers by artillery and the IAF.

The officer maintained that the heavy barrage of more than 3,000 shells fired by 155-millimetre and 175-mm howitzers, last week between early Friday morning and the same time Saturday, was also designed to disrupt Hezbollah's ability to launch Katyusha rockets at northern Israel.

"We are using the best equipment, the most up-to-date, with radar which enables us to pinpoint where Hezbollah is firing from and this is connected in a loop with digital networks directly to the computers in the gun itself," he said in a briefing with reporters.

"This enables us to fire back as fast as possible... and react to what Hezbollah is doing," he said.

The IDF's goal, he said, is to make sure it will not be worthwhile for Hezbollah to continue harassing the population in northern Israel. "So far, it seems that things are going as we planned, although I can't guarantee that there won't be a Katyusha rocket where we are sitting right now in this northern part of Israel.

"Nevertheless, Hezbollah has not been able to do as it wished. At the beginning, they were able to fire quite a lot but only a very small number of rockets since then."

After the initial attacks on Western Galilee and the panhandle, Hezbollah has since moved its launchers into the centres of villages, behind houses, especially in the Barasheet, Shakra and Majdal Salim areas, to try to avoid being hit by return fire, he said.

He stressed there was no policy of firing directly into villages, except in those cases where Hezbollah launched rocket attacks from inside the population centres. In those cases, the IDF was firing back quickly and directly at the targets.

He noted that other weapons could be used if necessary, in addition to the hi-tech guns already being employed. "We have many more guns and if we find it necessary we have got even more sophisticated artillery," he said.

Laser weapons being developed

By STEVE RODAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Several weeks after they played down the project, Israeli defence officials are urging a stepped-up effort to complete a laser system capable of destroying short-range rockets, such as the Katyushas now being fired from southern Lebanon.

Defence sources said the completion of the Nautilus project has now been added to the shopping list being prepared by Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who is to visit the United States at the end of the month.

In February, officials sought to minimize Israel's involvement in the successful test of Nautilus' laser, which destroyed an incoming Katyusha. The officials said the program was based on U.S. technology, with Israel being brought in only over the last year, largely to win congressional support for the continuation of Nautilus.

But the latest wave of Katyusha attacks has turned the Nautilus into a priority, defence sources said. They said with a concerted effort by Israel and the United States an operational laser interception system could be developed within the next two years.

Brando a no-show for public apology

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES - Marlon Brando failed to appear at a news conference where he was expected to atone for anti-Semitic comments he made on CNN's Larry King Live show.

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre hosted last Friday's media event to give Brando an opportunity to express remorse over his verbal assault on Jews in the entertainment industry.

During the hour-long interview with King on April 5, Brando said Jews "run" and "own" Hollywood, and that many films present demeaning stereotypes of ethnic minorities, with the exception of Jews.

"We have seen the nigger, we have seen the greaseball, we have seen the chink, the slit-eyed Jap," Brando told King. "But we never saw the kike, because they know perfectly well that's where you draw the wagons around."

While Jewish organizations responded with shock and outrage, the Wiesenthal Centre's founder and dean, Rabbi Marvin Hier, reported that Brando called him on April 8, expressing remorse for his remarks.

Hier said that the actor would tour the centre's Museum of Tolerance and make a public statement.

However, instead of Brando appearing, Hier and his colleague, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, reported on a private meeting they held with the actor at the home of attorney David Ross.

Ross, identified only as a friend of Brando, released at the news conference a communique that resulted from the three-hour session.

"Brando's intent in the near future is to clarify what he feels is a misunderstanding of a statement made in an unfortunate and incorrect manner due to the pressures of appearing" on a talk show, the communique said.

"Mr. Brando is known to the Jewish community as highly supportive of Jewish culture and religion for many decades, and a profound humanitarian concerned with human rights for all people and races."

In response to questions, Hier and Ross declared categorically that Brando is not an anti-Semite.

They said Brando's comments on the King show were misconstrued, and he never meant to imply that there was a Jewish conspiracy to keep negative images of Jews out of films.

Rather, because of his great admiration for Jews, Brando would expect them to take the lead in combatting demeaning stereotypes of all ethnic minorities, they said.

Hier and Ross explained that Brando was not able to clearly express his true sentiments on the CNN program because of constant interruptions by commercials and by King himself.

They said the actor would expound on his true sentiments in print and on TV programs which allow him to speak without interruptions.

The Right Fit for Every Body

Right Fit Alterations offers full alteration and mending services in any kind of material, including velvet, silk, suede, taffeta and leather — for both men and women.

Right Fit is owned by husband and wife partners Amir and Farrah Arabnezhad; each has 15 years experience in tailoring and alterations. After years of working with retail clothing stores, they opened the doors to Right Fit last December. Since then, they have been building a steady walk-in and referral clientele.

Amir points out that "even in today's varied marketplace, it is still hard for a full-figured woman to find clothes that are uniquely suited to her. That's where our master tailor comes in." As part of their comlete service, Right Fit designs and creates customized clothing for full-figured women.

As fashions change, styles need updating — which is, after all, a kind of specialized alteration. Everyone has a favorite dress or jacket, which Right Fit can alter to suit the changing trends.

Prices at Right Fit are very competitive. Friendly consultation is free, and there is no extra charge for work done same day or "while you wait".

Right Fit Alterations is in the Wycliffe Centre, 5915 Leslie St., Ste. 204, open Monday-Saturday 9:30 a.m.-6 p.m.; phone (416) 498-6888.

Films focus on Jewish life from Iraq to India

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The fourth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 2 to 9, will be launched by two Israeli films turning on the 1991 Gulf War.

The first, Home, is a quasi-documentary about an Iraqi Jewish family in Ramat Gan, Israel, waiting, somewhat nonchalantly and with their minds on other matters, for a Scud missile to fall on their city.

The second, Song of the Siren, Israel's most commercially successful film of 1994, is a romantic drama which unfolds as Tel Aviv is gripped in Scud fever.

This year's festival, which takes place at the Bloor Cinema, features a total of 31 films. Among them are a 1918 German silent movie about a young Jewish woman living in the Pale of Settlement (The Yellow Ticket) and a 1995 American documentary about the Holocaust (My Knees Were Jumping: Remembering the Kindertransports).

There will also be two documentaries about the Jewish community of Cuba: Havana Nagila: The Jews of Cuba and Abraham and Eugenia: Stories From Jewish Cuba.

From Hollywood comes a 1969 cult film entitled The Plot Against Harry, directed by Michael Romer.

The Jews of Rhodes are documented in Rhodes Forever, and the story of a Polish Jew raised in China is told in Round Eyes in the Middle Kingdom.

All That Really Matters is a Polish film revolving around a Jewish family which flees to Central Asia after the outbreak of World War II.

Bene Israel: A Family Portrait, is about India's venerable but depleted Jewish community.

Long is the Road, released in 1948 in U.S.-occupied Germany, is the first film made by and about Jewish displaced persons in the wake of World War II.

In addition, six international shorts will be screened. One of them, Dinner at Bubbie's, is a Canadian entry.

Song of the Siren kicks off the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Here, in chronological order, is a complete list of the films:

- May 2 — Song of the Siren and Home.
- May 4 — Sh'chur.
- May 5 — Abraham and Eugenia, Havana Nagila, Inside God's Bunker, You, Me and Jerusalem, Genghis Cohn and The Golem.
- May 6 — My Auntie Told Me, Round Eyes in the Middle Kingdom, Bene Israel, Report on the Living, Long is the Road, Dinner at Bubbie's, The Price is Right, Last and Only Survivor of Flora, Field Trip, Madame Jacques Sur La Croisette and This is Not Erotica.
- May 7 — Unpromised Land, Rhodes Forever, Carpati and All That Really Matters.
- May 8 — My Knees Were Jumping, Swallows Never Die in Jerusalem and The Plot Against Harry.
- May 9 — Dealers Among Dealers, I Want to be a Boarder and The Yellow Ticket.

Sculptor unveils artwork commissioned for Olympics

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Misha Frid, "sculptor of dreams," brings another dimension to his essentially classic art with the Toronto unveiling of two pieces, Equestrian and Gymnast.

Both were commissioned for the 1996 Summer Olympic Games in Atlanta, Ga., and can be seen at an exhibition of new and retrospective works in the Sculptor's Society of Canada Gallery, First Canadian Place, Exchange Tower, 130 King St. West, through May 3.

Frid participates annually in New York City's international Art Expo, which attracts entries from across the globe. For some years, he has been "closely watched" by the official Olympic art committee and was invited to submit his concepts in the field of horsemanship and gymnastics for the 1996 games.

"It wasn't easy," he says. "To do the Equestrian, I visited several clubs outside Toronto — and they are locating farther and farther from the city — to learn everything I could about the horse and rider, the proper habit, the right gear, how they move together."

Gymnast

For the Gymnast, he read "everything" and studied live models plus "many, many drawings and photographs."

Frid, who works in bronze and crystal, sculpted Equestrian and Gymnast in crystal, using a patented technique which suggests a Lalique radiance.

Each piece relates to a freeform crystalized block.

Equestrian portrays horse and rider in three stages: Starting the jump the pair are embedded in crystal; emerging from it, they are at peak height; and finally landing the jump, the figures are in relief outside the block.

Gymnast reveals a supple, exquisitely graceful young girl going through a tumbling routine. She stands poised within the crystal, springs upward, somersaults, is gradually freed and touches down in triumph.

Frid's decision to use interior and emerging forms to project initial tension, reach and ultimate achievement encourages the viewer to identify with the excitement of the contest.

Equestrian and Gymnast will be displayed at the Olympic Gallery in Atlanta during the Summer Games, in company with works by other officially selected painters and sculptors.

To inquire about the Toronto exhibition, call 416-214-0389. Gallery hours are Monday to Friday, 11 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Gymnast* is one of two pieces commissioned for the Olympic Games.

Schadchan matches mates

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Remember Yenta the matchmaker? Well, the practice of making Jewish shidduchs that was common in the shtetl has continued in the '90s.

Evelyn Potok, 36, is a modern-day schadchan. But this Thornhill mother of two says she bears no resemblance to her counterpart in Fiddler on the Roof. "I'm not a 60-year-old bubbie saying, 'Have I got a match for you!' I'm contemporary, an upbeat young mother."

Potok started Soulmates Introduction Services, a commercial dating service, in 1990. She focuses exclusively on Jewish people because, she says, she's committed to thwarting assimilation through intermarriage.

"In the 1990s, there was a need for a structured service that would offer introductions to Jewish people," she says.

She charges a yearly fee of $300, which includes registration and a minimum of four qualified introductions.

Potok has had a knack for matchmaking since she was a teenager, she says. "My husband and I were setting people up all the time. We always knew a lot of people."

In fact, they themselves met on a blind date through a mutual friend back in high school.

"The most effective way of meeting a mate is through a friend," but many people who exhaust their friends' contacts or are too busy to meet people need her service, she says.

Potok is constantly looking for single people and adding new names to her roster, she says. "I make it my business to know who's available. As soon as I hear someone is available I talk to them."

She says she has an active client list of 500 people and she has access to an additional 1,000 names through other dating services which pool their resources to improve their clients' prospects.

She works closely with her clients to understand what they're looking for in a mate, but she says many people are unrealistic in their expectations and she tries to help them be more realistic.

Old stereotypes for dating and mating still hold true for the '90s, Potok says. Typically physical attributes tend to be very important to her male clients — they ask for attractive slim women — while her

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Ohr Yaacov: Art galleries, historic old synagogues, narrow lanes and panoramic views of the Galilee await travellers to the picturesque town of Sefat, the highest village in Israel.

It was in Sefat recently that I met Yaacov (Jacques) Kaszemacher, a French-born chassidic Jew who sells his own paintings and photographs in his own gallery. Kaszemacher, who has had several art shows in Toronto, was born outside Paris at a time when the French capital was occupied by the Gestapo.

"I was not raised religiously," he says. "My grandparents were religious Jews from Poland, and I grew up in a secular house in the St.-Germain-de-Pres section of Paris."

In the mid-'60s, seeking some form of spiritual experience, he went to New York, hitchhiked to Panama, then wandered throughout South America and "had my first awareness of God." Returning to New York, he turned vegetarian: "I became kosher without being aware of it."

Still seeking spiritual learning, he was planning a trip to India when a radical idea hit him. "Suddenly I thought, 'Hey, I'm Jewish!' I knew not to drive or smoke on Shabbat but I didn't know from what time to what time. So I thought I would come to Israel to find out."

Arriving in Israel in 1971, he learned Hebrew and began studying the Torah and other Jewish holy books. At the same time, he raised a family and established himself as a photographer and artist of geometric canvases inspired by the arcane Jewish science of gematria or numerology.

Several years ago, while in Toronto to deliver a painting, Kaszemacher met a member of the Reichmann family. Chiefly as a result of this fortuitous connection, he later curated an exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario featuring the work of eight religious artists from Sefat. He has also had several solo art shows in the Toronto area.

Kaszemacher's shop, Ohr Yaacov Gallery (06-974566), is located at 9 Yosef Caro Rd. Tell him you saw him in Eye On Arts. That is, of course, unless you read about him in the Lonely Planet travel guide for Israel, in which he is mentioned as a "fascinating character."

Jewish Libraries Conference: The 31st annual convention of the Association of Jewish Libraries takes place June 16 to 19, Park Plaza Hotel, Toronto. The theme is Culture and Continuity – A Jewish Commitment.

Planned presentations include talks on Jewish library history and Internet resources for Judaica libraries. Readings by Joe Kertes, Alan Gould and Morley Torgov on the subject of Canadian Jewish Humor have been arranged as the keynote address. A planned marketplace will offer Judaica publications, software and art and crafts.

For details, contact Edmund Y. Lipsitz, 416-785-7941.

Two New York Shows: Marc Chagall 1907-1917, an exhibition highlighting the Jewish artist's attempt to combine modernism and religion, opened earlier this month at the Jewish Museum in New York City. Until Aug. 4.

Four performances of The Accused, an opera musical about the Dreyfus affair, were given this month at the New York City Opera. The opera debuted two years in German at the Deutsche Oper in Berlin, to mark the centenary of the beginning of the French political scandal; it later played in Basel, Switzerland. Librettist George Whyte told the Forward, a New York-based weekly Jewish newspaper, that there are no plans at present for the opera to be performed in France.

Schadchan finds matches female clients want to meet "career-oriented financially successful men," she says.

Meeting people gets more difficult with age: dating is relatively easy when people are in their 20s, but their prospects narrow considerably once they hit their 30s, according to Potok. The most difficult age is 55 plus; in that group, she has 10 women for every man, she says.

About 70 percent of Potok's business comes from people in their 30s and 40s, many of whom are divorced with children, and she's had a high success rate — 80 percent end up in long-term relationships with six a year culimnating in marriage, she says.

El Al Experiences Drop In Reservations

JERUSALEM – El Al has experienced a drop of seven to eight percent in reservations, apparently as a result of the recent wave of suicide bombers, company spokesperson Osnat Lapidot said last week.

She added that although there had been no comprehensive study, the decline probably derived from last-minute decisions to cancel visits to Israel because of the terror attacks.

Or Chaim records best showing yet at tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was good news and bad news for the Or Chaim Knights at the recently concluded Red Sarachek high school basketball tournament in New York City.

First the good news. The Knights were runners-up in the second tier of the tournament competition and got to the final after playing their best game of the year against the Hebrew Academy of Miami, winning by about 20 points.

The bad news? It's really not that bad: the Knights were given a lesson in top-level basketball by Rambam High School of New York in their opening game, showing just how far they have to go to beat the highly competitive U.S. hoopsters.

Nevertheless, the Knights managed their best showing yet in four years at the tournament, said head coach Tuvia Aronson, an Or Chaim alumnus.

Sixteen teams from across North America participated in the annual, invitational event, including Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Bialik of Montreal and Yeshiva High School of Hamilton.

Game one for the Knights was against Rambam and Or Chaim kept it close in the early going. "But their experience and their New York style led to a blow out," Aronson conceded.

"Their level of competition was very intense and their school puts pressure on themselves to be fiercely competitive," he said.

"We were outsized most of the tournament but we compensated with our speed at the guard positions," Aronson added.

Having lost their opening match, Or Chaim (like all first round losers) was relegated to the second tier, which included Block Yeshiva High School of St. Louis, Hillel Academy of Miami, Hebrew Academy of Miami, Yeshiva of Memphis, Beit Sefer Mizrachi of Cleveland and Hamilton Yeshiva.

In Game 2, Or Chaim beat Block pretty handily and in Game 3 "we whipped the Hebrew Academy of Miami," Aronson said. "Our boys came up big time. We won really easily. It was probably the best game we played all season."

Next came Hillel Academy in a battle for first place in the second tier. Or Chaim fell behind early but battled back to within six points.

"They broke our press defence for a run of points in the fourth quarter," Aronson explained. "We tried a couple of desperation three-pointers, but they didn't fall."

Despite the loss, Aronson is pleased with the second place finish since "the school did not do that before."

Eitan Prisman, a point guard with Or Chaim, was named the Knights' all-star player. "He was one of the better point guards in the tournament," Aronson said.

Other members of the team included Zvi Katzman, Meir Rosenzweig, Robbie Scheininger, Yoni Rutman, Jonathan Spiegelman, Natan Kapustin, David Ulmer, David Forshtendiker, Jason Moskoske and Ron Somogyi.

The team's manager was Ari Fudim and the assistant coach was Mordie Katzman.

Hoopster's story a true 'tall tale'

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

BUFFALO — For the first time in perhaps 30 years, two Jewish players will be drafted by the National Basketball Association (NBA) on June 26.

Most hoops fans are familiar with Doron Sheffer, the six-foot-five point guard who has starred for the University of Connecticut the last three seasons.

Sheffer is expected to be the first sabra to be drafted by an NBA team — which will be sure to be reported in the nation's media.

But an even better story is that of Eric Gingold, the other Jewish player.

Eric who?

Gingold is expected to be drafted despite never having started a game as either a high school or college player. In addition, no NBA official who drafts him — or contemplates selecting him — has ever seen him play in a game.

In fact, Gingold has not played a game for more than two years. He has only been working out — after 11 operations and eight blood transfusions following an auto accident — since December.

Does this sound like a "tall story?"

It is a very tall story, because Gingold is seven-foot-four and as experts say, "You can't coach or teach height."

In fact, it's such an improbable story that the Walt Disney organization has purchased its rights.

A good student, Gingold enrolled at Williams College after touring colleges and having one assistant coach tell him: "If I haven't heard of you, you must really stink!"

At Williams College, he got into 30 games, scored 31 points and grabbed only 36 rebounds. He couldn't even dunk the ball when he enrolled.

"But he did have one good game, although it was an exhibition," said a Williams official. "We played against the Belorus junior team and he scored 13 points, grabbed six rebounds and stuffed the ball in over their centre," a seven-footer named Alexander Kuhl, who was a top point producer for George Washington University this past season.

"Gingold's a physical specimen now; he can run two miles in 12 minutes. When he was here, he couldn't run two miles in two days! Yes, he lacks experience, but he has no bad habits, either," the official said.

If Gingold makes it in the NBA, credit Larry Gillman, his personal coach/agent and a former coach at East Carolina. After reading about Gingold in a basketball magazine, Gillman began working with him and got West Virginia University interested.

After sitting out a year as a transfer student and building his body up to 290 pounds with only 11 percent body fat, Gingold was ready to take on major college competition — until the accident, which left him unconscious for several minutes. In surgery, he had a metal plate inserted into his cracked hip and a rod into the shattered leg.

All the follow-up operations, blood transfusions and post-operative complications left him in critical condition for three weeks. But once he received medical clearance to resume work-outs, his improvement was remarkable.

Dick Percudani, director of scouting for the Phoenix Suns, is one of the many who have flocked to Newtown, Conn., where Gingold shows his talents in workouts and in one-on-one sessions with equally tall players.

"He shoots well with either hand, he moves well, he has good hands, he's a bright kid who learns easily," Percudani said. "I'm amazed he wasn't able to get more done at Williams. He's passed 'Basketball 101' but advanced classes are full-court scrimmages."

Added Percudani, "I saw him hook left, hook right, shoot jumpers at the top of the key and not miss ... shoot free throws and not miss. I saw him dunk. I had them measure the baskets to make sure they hadn't lowered them on me. It was unreal."

Gillman's strategy seems to be to limit pro teams to individual visits.

Some scouts are whispering: "What is Gillman hiding?"

To which he replies, "If a team hasn't seen enough of Eric, than don't pick him. Somebody else will."

"I know there are questions," says Gingold, "but I don't worry. After what I've been through, I don't worry about much."

275 PERSONAL COMPANIONS WANTED

You are a sincere, honest, romantic D/W/JM prof., late 50s, with a passion for simple pleasures, ready to meet a refined, cultured Jewish lady who'll love and spoil you. If so please call 416-812-6766 and leave msg.

Jewish professional male, 35, tall, attractive, athletic, down-to-earth, non-smoker & active. You are female, 25-35, attractive with similar qualities. Please lv. msg, 416-631-4706.

Wanted: Single Jewish Women, Melbourne, Australia.
We are an informal group of Melbourne-based single Jewish males aged mid-30s to early-40s who have not yet met those special SJFs to share each of our lives. Despite each of us mixing actively in different circles, we have found the Melbourne and Sydney social scene to be 'stale' with a shortage of eligible SJFs.
The majority of remaining 30+ y/o SJFs are either divorced with children or carrying heavy emotional or other unacceptable baggage. Within the organised Jewish community, despite the noise from our 'leaders', there is no truly effective means of meeting potential partners. Essentially, any effort to do so must be our own. So we have chosen to advertise overseas.
We are each professionally qualified or self-employed. We are each healthy and 'normal' with no physical or intellectual disabilities. We are each well-travelled, genuine, positive and sensitive guys. Most of us are well established. We are not necessarily tall, dark or especially handsome and none of us ride white horses, but each of us is 'a good catch'. None of us have been married. We are all committed to living in Melbourne, a clean, safe, green and very comfortable city of over 3 million people with an active Jewish community of some 45,000.
This is not a match-making service but a logical means of making contact with eligible, intelligent, SJFs who would contemplate relocation to Australia. So if you are: 1. in your 30s to early 40s; 2. attractive; 3. intelligent; 4. without serious disability or baggage, and 5. prepared to relocate, then please send comprehensive details, preferably including photo(s), phone & fax numbers in the first instance to:
Albert Sattler, P. O. Box 227, South Yarra, Victoria 3141, Australia or fax: +61-3-9523-0945
or e-mail: Maddison@connexus.apana.org.au.
Be assured of complete confidentiality.
All correspondence will be promptly acknowledged.

Leadership slates viewed as extremist

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israel's two major political parties, Labor and Likud, have emerged from pre-election primaries with their leadership slates markedly more extreme than the images they were each seeking to project in the election campaign.

Analysis

At the recent Labor party primary, a longtime and outspoken dove, Minister of Tourism Uzi Baram, topped the field.

Baram, 59, emerged as the second most popular figure in Israel's ruling Labor party, defeating two self-proclaimed future prime ministerial hopefuls, Foreign Minister Ehud Barak and Interior Minister Haim Ramon.

Baram will be listed behind Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who was already chosen as the party's candidate for prime minister and was therefore assured the top slot.

The Likud primaries catapulted former IDF general and political neophyte Yitzhak Mordechai to an equally unexpected victory.

The results of the primaries could complicate the two parties' respective efforts to appeal in the weeks ahead to Israel's swing voters, whose preferences will decide the May 29 general election. This sector of the electorate is traditionally identified as centrist.

To attract their support, Labor has been stressing security concerns in its election campaign, while Likud has stressed its support of the peace process.

The main Labor party slogan is "A Strong Israel with Peres," while Likud's slogan is "Peace with Security."

These platforms hardly fit the trends reflected in the primary results, but the reason for this disparity is clear: The primaries are not "open;" they are limited to registered and paid-up party members.

Characteristically, such people are more "ideological" than people who are politically less active and less identified with a specific party.

The primary results reflected this ideological slant of party members, who favored the more radical candidates on each side of the political spectrum.

As a result of the Likud primary, Mordechai will actually appear fourth on the list because of Likud's recent merger with two smaller opposition parties, Gesher, led by David Levy, and Tsomet, led by Rafael Eitan.

Topping the combined list will be Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, followed by Levy and Eitan, then Mordechai.

Following Mordechai on the list as a result of the primary will be arch-hardliner Ariel Sharon, the former defence minister and current Knesset member who successfully brokered the merger with Gesher and Tsomet.

The next two places on the Likud list went to Moshe Katsav and Ze'ev "Benny" Begin, neither of whom is considered a moderate.

Only then do the first two Likud moderates appear: Dan Meridor, a former justice minister, and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

For their part, Labor officials on the whole were pleased with the party list that emerged from Monday's primary.

Rounding out the top five Labor slots after Peres and Baram were Barak, Housing Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and Ramon.

Finishing in sixth place in the Labor primary was Finance Minister Avraham Shochat, followed by Nissim Zvilli in the spot protected for the party's secretary general, and Health Minister Ephraim Sneh.

Ninth place, a spot promised to the woman who finished first in the primary, was taken by Dalia Itzik.

Deputy Defence Minister Ori Orr came in next, followed by Yossi Beilin, Peres' closest adviser on foreign policy matters.

Baram made it clear that he no longer necessarily accepted the conventional wisdom that Barak, the former IDF chief of staff, and Ramon, the former Histadrut chair, would battle between themselves for the succession to the prime ministership when Peres, if re-elected, steps down in 1999.

Baram's dyed-in-the-wool dovishness attracted public attention in the late 1980s, when he refused to join a Likud-Labor government of national unity on the grounds that the Likud's opposition to peace moves would paralyze the government.

A one-time secretary general of the party, he was among the first of Labor's Knesset members to call openly for mutual recognition between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

For Labor, that magic number is between 44 and 46, according to recent opinion polls.

The combined Likud-Gesher-Tsomet list has about 42 safe seats, according to polls. Fourteen of those seats have been allocated to the two smaller parties, leaving only 28 for loyal Likud supporters.

Labor voters also dealt a blow to Minister of Religious Affairs Shimon Shetreet, who has embarrassed the prime minister by some high-profile moves against the Orthodox establishment.

Voters in the primary "punished" some lackluster cabinet figures, including Trade Minister Michael Harish, who was squeezed out of the list of so-called "safe seats," positions that are expected to win seats in the next Knesset.

The Labor primary produced 14 "new faces" among the first 44 names on the list, and the party's campaign is now expected to accentuate the new blood injected into the party's veins.

Bon Voyage! Our last article dealt with preparing day campers for their first camp outing. In today's installment we will discuss the first overnight experience. Our next installment will focus on the teenager who suddenly refuses to go to camp.

It is at age eight or nine that most children will begin to consider sleepover camp. At this age, children are going through a mastery stage, in which they are learning to persevere and see a task through to its conclusion. Sleepover camp is one of the many new challenges that children of this age are confronting, and you must help them determine whether they are ready to master this particular challenge.

There are a number of steps you can take to help assess your child's readiness. One indicator will be who first broached the subject of camp. It is ideal if the child has approached the parent, since this gives the child more control over the process.

If your child does broach the topic, set aside some uninterrupted time to discuss the issue. You should address the type of camp your child envisions attending (i.e. — is it a sports camp, an arts camp, a horseback riding camp or a general all purpose one?) You can involve your child in the research process by having brochures sent to your home. Some camps will send videos or hold promotional meetings that you can attend. Your child can review all the available information and list the pros and cons of each camp. At this age peers are becoming increasingly important, so consider talking to other families whose children have attended camps you are considering. Your child can speak to the attender and you can speak to the parent.

The initial narrowing down of the choice must be made with a number of factors in mind. Some decisions will be based purely on your child's needs and desires, but others will be based on more practical considerations, such as your family budget. As parents, you must be sure to take into account the needs of every family member , as well the entire family. Cost out these family expenses before committing to a plan you cannot afford.

Next determine the length of time the child will be away. The options can conceivably range from days to months, so be sure to pick a time frame consistent with your child's needs and capabilities. In making the decision, be sure to take into account your child's input – at this point, s/he is probably in a good position to indicate to you what s/he is ready for.

In preparing for the experience, there are a number of specific issues you should be sure to address. For example, since peers are a going concern at this point, wardrobe is a big item. Camps usually have a specific list which can help curtail overspending on wardrobe.

Psychological preparation will involve discussing camp and feelings about leaving home. Have your child imagine what leaving will be like. Give he or she permission to discuss any hesitation or negative feelings.

To ease the transition into the camp experience, you can arrange some sleepover experiences prior to the beginning of camp. When your child does leave, have him/her take a favourite keepsake or two to camp as reminders of home. Assist your child with letter writing by preparing self-addressed envelopes. You may want to send letters in advance so that your child feels an immediate connection to home.

Remember – the most important part of the preparation is ensuring that your child wants to go to camp because she or he is ready, and not because he wants to be accepted by peers or please his parents.

The Last Word . . . DO YOU NEED INCOME?

If you depend upon your investments to generate income, you probably are not happy with today's interest rates. Here are two suggestions which may help you improve your income during difficult times.

Invest in a dividend Mutual Fund. The returns are probably better than G.I.C. and the dividend incomes receives better tax treatment.

Consider converting your RRSP to a RRIF and take some income. As long as you are under age 69, you can always convert your RRIF back to an RRSP if you eventually do not need this income.

Israelis support Lebanon action

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Israeli reaction to the IDF shelling that killed over 100 Lebanese refugees seems to prove one thing: it takes a left-wing government to garner public support for war.

The tragedy that sparked an international uproar did not prompt much of an outcry in Israel. Most members of the government, as well as of the opposition, backed Prime Minister Shimon Peres' defiant stance. An angry Peres blamed Hezbollah for the refugees' deaths and reiterated the IDF's right to shoot back when fired upon.

Among Israelis, the most typical response to the incident was regret – not so much for the Lebanese victims, as for the un-realized goals of the Israeli military operation.

"If Israel caves in to international pressure and stops the operation now, we will have achieved nothing" said one Tel Avivian.

That reaction is a far cry from the one that followed Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon – a war that culminated in a massive protest and commission of inquiry into Israel's role in the massacre at the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps (where Lebanese Christian forces murdered hundreds of Palestinian civilians in an area under IDF control).

Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan, who was chief of staff during the 1982 Lebanon War, was quick to note the silence of the left today. "Where are all those who clamored so vociferously for the Sabra and Shatilla inquiry?" asked Eitan. "If the left was in the opposition today, they would have seen to it that all hell broke loose," he charged.

'If Israel caves in, we will have achieved nothing'

"Eitan could be right," admitted Labor MK Yael Dayan, a strident critic of the Lebanon War. "If Likud was in power, this tragic incident might have led to nationwide protests."

Eitan calls this hypocrisy. Peres supporters call it trust.

"Peres has a vision of peace. If he embarks on such an action, it's because he has no other choice," maintains Jonathan Margalit, a Metulla resident who voted for the left-wing Meretz party in the last election. "I feel very badly about the killing of innocent people. It was a mistake. But I don't think Israel can back down one iota from this military campaign. What would the United States do if Mexicans were launching rockets at border settlements in southern states?"

Margalit adds that "if Bibi [Netanyahu] were prime minister, I'd still support this action, but I'd be very uneasy about it."

Leah Livni, another staunch Peres supporter, puts it more bluntly: "If Bibi had been prime minister when this happened I'd be foaming at the mouth – especially if 'warmongers' like Eitan and [Ariel] Sharon were in the cabinet. But Peres is a world-class diplomat – I have faith in him."

Livni says she was deeply disturbed by the killing of the refugees and admits she had doubts about the military operation right from the start. But she hopes the goal will justify the means.

"Peres is striving for an agreement that will enable the IDF to withdraw from Lebanon while ensuring quiet in northern Israel. I don't think Bibi has any interest in

Women of Distinction

TORONTO – Rabbi Elyse Goldstein has been named one of eight winners of the YMCA of Metropolitan Toronto Women of Distinction Awards.

Rabbi Goldstein was chosen in the field of education. The awards will be presented May 15.

ISRAEL

Air Force In Turkey

JERUSALEM – Israeli jets have arrived in Turkey to begin training flights there under the terms of a military exchange accord signed in February by the two countries.

The sources said eight Israeli F-16 training jets and their crews arrived last week in Turkey, adding that the planes were unarmed and lacked any surveillance equipment.

Israel wanted its pilots to be able to train in Turkey, whose air space is less limited than the Jewish state's, according to the sources.

Dinitz Convicted

JERUSALEM – Former Jewish Agency chair Simcha Dinitz was found guilty last week of fraud and abuse of public trust for purchasing personal items at the agency's expense. Sentencing was set for next month by Jerusalem District Court.

Dinitz was cleared of charges of misusing his agency-issued American Express card. The court accepted his defence that, while he bought personal items with the credit card, it was the job of Agency bookkeepers to deduct the payments from his salary.

Spy's Release Denied

JERUSALEM – The High Court of Justice last week refused to release convicted spy Marcus Klingberg, saying that the ailing Israeli could still endanger national security.

The Polish-born Klingberg, 77, has served 12 years of an 18-year sentence for spying for the former Soviet Union.

WORLD

Hezbollah Threats

BUENOS AIRES – Argentine authorities have declared a countrywide alert against a possible terrorist attack by members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement.

The government here said last Tuesday it was "alarmed" after the Shi'ite movement announced that it would attack Jewish targets worldwide in revenge for Israel's current bombing campaign in Lebanon.

Cantors Assembly

NEW YORK – Hundreds of Conservative cantors will bring the sacred music of the Jewish people to the streets of Israel when the Cantors Assembly, the world's largest body of chazzanim, holds its Jubilee Convention from July 21 to Aug. 4 in Jerusalem.

The assembly is composed of some 450 cantors serving congregations in Canada, Israel, the United States and other countries around the world.

Charges Planned

BUENOS AIRES – Two sergeants in the Argentine army will soon be charged in connection with the July 18, 1994, bombing of the Argentine Jewish Mutual Aid Association, (AMIA) that left 86 dead and 300 wounded.

Sources close to the AMIA investigation confirmed that the official in charge of the probe, Judge Juan Jose Galeano, is ready to press charges against the two.

JA Envoy Atttacked

BUDAPEST – An Afghani refugee who was angered by Israel's bombing campaign in Lebanon repeatedly stabbed an emissary of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Rabbi Yisrael Taub, who was taken to a local hospital with stab wounds to the head, neck and hands, was later described as in serious but stable condition.

Polakoff Dies

WASHINGTON – When Joseph Polakoff died two week's ago at the age of 87, the Jewish community lost a veteran journalist known to many as a strong advocate for Israel and U.S. Jews.

Polakoff, who served as the Jewish Telegraphic Agency's Washington bureau chief from 1970 to 1982, never retired from the profession he began to work in seven decades ago.

REACTION TO LEBANON BOMBING

CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS

MONTREAL — Goldie Hershon, president of Congress, expressed deep sorrow and pain over the loss of life in Lebanon. "We convey our profound sadness over today's tragedy," she stated. "It is always heart-rending to see civilians caught in the middle of such a conflict."

B'NAI BRITH CANADA

TORONTO – Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, released the following statement shortly after the shelling of a United Nations refugee camp: "Today's events in Lebanon are a tragedy, and the Jewish community regrets the loss of innocent life in Lebanon. The event highlights the need for an immediate solution to this protracted conflict which has resulted in dislocation and hardship for both Israeli and Lebanese civilians."

CANADA-ISRAEL COMMITTEE

OTTAWA – Stephen Victor, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, expressed sincere regret over the deaths and injuries of Lebanese civilians in a UN camp in southern Lebanon. "We are saddened by the loss of innocent lives and emphasize that Israel has been making every effort in its operations against Hezbollah to avoid civilian casualties."

CANADIAN FRIENDS OF PEACE NOW

TORONTO – Canadian Friends of Peace Now profoundly regrets the tragic deaths resulting from an Israeli bombing of a United Nations refugee centre in Lebanon. We remain hopeful that the international community will be able to broker a security arrangement for southern Lebanon or at a minimum, a ceasefire.

CANADIAN ARAB FEDERATION

TORONTO – The Canadian Arab Federation condemns the latest massacre of Lebanese civilians, which has resulted in the loss of 94 innocent lives. We are outraged at the international silence that has greeted this latest Israeli incursion into Lebanon and wonder what it will take for the world to take action and stop the bloodshed.

Reform rules out same sex marriages in Canada

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Same sex marriages between gays and lesbians will not be performed by Reform rabbis in Canada, said Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb, executive director, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ).

"There is a great deal of confusion about the resolution passed by the Central Conference of American Rabbis," he said. "The important thing to note is that the conference made no decision about Reform rabbis officiating at such ceremonies. We [the Canadian rabbis attending] would have preferred that the matter of officiation was debated so we could oppose it."

The conference, attended by 1,700 Reform rabbis in Philadelphia at the end of March, did approve civil marriages for gays and lesbians to prevent discrimination against them by jurisdictions in the United States planning laws against such marriages, but took no action on kiddushin, religious marriages, Rabbi Komito-Gottlieb said.

"Even on civil marriages the resolution changes nothing here as I am not aware of any Reform rabbis who perform such marriages in Canada," he said.

Rabbi Komito-Gottlieb said the CCRJ did support the principle of spousal benefits for same sex marriages when that was proposed for Ontario. The measure was not approved.

"The resolution was put forward at the last minute, whether wilfully I don't know, but most of the Canadian rabbis, including myself, had left for the airport," said Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, Temple Sinai's founding rabbi. "It was not proper that such an important matter should come forward to the conference out of thin air."

Rabbi Pearlson said marriage relationships must be looked at in a new way because of changes in sexual technology and of society's attitude to relationships, but that the conference resolution did not deal with it.

The resolution approved in Philadelphia does not change his position, or the situation in Canada, said Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple.

"Mixed marriages [people of different religious faiths] are legal in Canada but I don't perform them. Even if same sex marriages becomes legal it does not mean I have to perform such marriages. Because some Reform rabbis in the United States perform them, there is the temptation to come to the conclusion that it takes place in Canada."

The resolution is part of the Reform movement's long standing advocacy of civil rights for everyone, irrespective of sexual orientation, Rabbi Marmur said.

Though he was not present when it was presented, Rabbi Michael Stroh of Temple Har Zion said he would have voted against the resolution approving civil marriages of gays and lesbians.

"I don't want to hurt gays and lesbians but I think the matter requires more time and thought than it was given. A marriage service for two people of the same sex is a radical change. I want to be better informed."

Youth protest 'desecration' at Auschwitz

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 90 young people from 20 Jewish youth groups and anti-racist organizations demonstrated at the Polish consulate last week on Yom Hashoah to protest "the continued desecration" at Auschwitz.

Holding posters and candles, the demonstrators gathered to send a message to the Polish government and people that "the sanctity of Auschwitz as the largest Jewish graveyard in the world" must be preserved, said David Sheen, one of the event organizers.

"We're here to protest the continued desecration of Auschwitz by the construction of a shopping mall, the parade of neo-Nazis and [the fact that] a 10-metre high cross hasn't been removed," said Sheen, coordinator of the Zionist Betar-Tagar Movement in Toronto.

Prior to the arrival of the majority of the protesters, Polish Consul-General Wojciech Tycinski circulated among the 25 students present at the time and met with Sheen. There was no animosity or hard feeling as the two chatted briefly about the demonstration.

Yom Hashoah
More coverage pages 14-16, 20

Tycinski told The CJN that he hopes to improve relations between young Jews and Poles, perhaps by organizing joint programs.

He pointed out that the work on the mall was stopped by Polish authorities at the end of March and that a special session of the International Council of the State Musuem in Auschwitz will meet at the end of April to discuss recent events.

"The lastest events concerning the museum in Oswiecim (Auschwitz) demonstrate that emotions show quite easily in the Polish-Jewish dialogue," stated a news release distributed by Tycinski. "There is no rational explanation whatsoever as to why each dispute that concerns the question of how to best administer the grounds of the museum should turn into a Polish-Jewish debate on fundamental principles.

"New relations between the Polish and Jewish nations ... have to be based on a system of European values, on mutual respect and understanding and on the search for common cultural experiences," the release concludes.

The latest controversy erupted several months ago with the construction of a shopping mall only 30 metres away from the gates of the notorious Auschwitz death camp where an estimated one million Jews were murdered.

Work on the mall was stopped after a storm of protests erupted worldwide. Then about a week before Yom Hashoah, the annual commemoration of the Holocaust, a group of 100 neo-Nazis was allowed to parade through Auschwitz

Essence of Israel is in its memory

Last week, on the morning after we heard the news of the terrible, mistaken bombing by Israel of the Lebanese civilians in Cana, I stopped by the office of Udi Savion, Israel's aliyah shaliach in Toronto, for coffee and conversation.

Savion has been in Toronto just over two years and he is highly regarded for the quality of his work and for the quality of his character. He is a large man, self-effacing, with a ready, generous smile, who speaks emotionally, though quietly.

I had arranged to see him to talk about Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, but the bitter news of the day before preoccupied us both.

"One of the most important subjects that we learn and that we teach in the IDF," he said pointedly, "is respect for the human rights and the dignity of others. We always try to find as many ways as possible to minimize civilian casualties. This is not simply a matter of policy or of training or of manuals. It is inherent in our nature."

Savion is certainly qualified to speak on the subject of IDF training and military policy. He has devoted fully 25 of his 45 years to service in the navy, 19 of them as a commander at sea. He is now Commander (Res.), having retired from active service a little more than three years ago.

Twenty-three years ago, as a deputy commander of a missile boat, he fought against the navies of Egypt and Syria. Five years later and then again in 1982, he was assigned to retaliate against Islamic extremists, who were then, as today, trying to rain death down upon the heads of the people of Israel living in the north.

It was very important to Savion that I understood the connection between Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut. For, as he explained and continually emphasized, this painful, hallowed relationship between the two commemorations is the key to understanding the true nature of the State of Israel.

The essence of Israel is in its memory.

From the early years at school, "we grow up with the stories of the army. There is a culture of remembering the fallen and of honoring the casualties. It influences the way of life of our young people when they are growing up. It acts as a motivation to make the extra effort on behalf of their colleagues, their friends, their fellow soldiers."

Not inclined to philosophical musings, Savion offered a final example to make certain I understood the point he was making: "A commander teaches not only the professional aspects of being a soldier to those under his command, but also and equally as important, the moral and spiritual aspects of being a soldier. When you are standing on the bridge of the boat, and you know that a missile is coming towards you and you are scared to death, you must show leadership.

"Yom Hazikaron is vital for passing on the same spirit of sacrifice as the one cherished by the people who came before us. It is the cornerstone of our moral and national education.

"Why do we switch immediately from Yom Hazikaron to Yom Ha'atzmaut, from remembering to celebration? Because of the heritage, the sacrifice and the real lives that were lived, lost and dedicated to building the country."

Israel is only three years older than Savion. For an individual, a span of nearly five decades is close to life's mid-point. But for a country, it is still only a prelude.

Israel is still only in prelude. Its achievements in every sphere and field of human endeavor belie its youth. Like people grown used to seeing the sun rise each day, we no longer marvel at the way it casts aside the dark. So too with Israel. We seldom marvel now at what has been built upon the sand, at what has been made to grow out of the desert, at what has arisen out of the ashes.

Sitting next to him, I became aware, yet again, of the invisible forces, the coincidences, accidents and predeterminations that have directed individual destinies throughout Jewish history.

He and I, both 45 years old, are of the same generation, both born after World War II into a world in which European Jewry had just been destroyed but Jewish national sovereignty had just been restored. Yet, the responsibilities his generation in Israel has had to bear are so vastly different, so vastly more consequential, than that same generation – my generation – in Diaspora has had to carry.

At the age of 21, when my friends and I were thinking of the next set of exams, Savion was commander of a patrol boat. At 28, when my friends and I were thinking of the amount of our mortgage payments, he was commander of a missile boat. At 34, when my friends and I were thinking of starting an RRSP, he was the commander of a missile boat squadron.

Of course, the particular steps along Savion's path are not typical of most of his generation, even in Israel. He is, after all, an exceptional person. But what is typical of the path followed by all of his generation, unlike that in Diaspora, is that it has always been bordered by matters of life and death. Even to this day.

Regulatory body urged for teachers

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The establishment of an independent regulatory body for Ontario teachers will help ensure that children are protected from bigoted and anti-Semitic teachers, according to Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

Bernie Farber, CJC's director of community relations, last week addressed an Ontario legislative committee hearing public submissions on Bill 31, which would set up the Ontario College of Teachers, an independent body that would regulate the profession and police its practitioners.

The bill recently passed second reading.

Farber pointed out that three high-profile cases of anti-Semitic and far-right activity in recent history involved teachers: Jim Keegstra in Alberta, Malcolm Ross in New Brunswick and Paul Fromm in Ontario.

In each case, Farber said, school boards and unions failed to protect students from the teachers' bigotry. Only courts and other legal bodies finally brought resolutions.

The Supreme Court of Canada recently upheld rulings against both Keegstra and Ross.

Keegstra openly preached anti-Semitism in the classroom, and neither the school board nor his union dealt with the situation, Farber told the MPPs.

As for Ross, who did not bring his views into class, the school board, "while taking some minor disciplinary action, never effectively dealt with the fact that Ross was one of Canada's leading public anti-Semites."

In fact, the board initially retained Ross as a teacher. Only after a parent launched a human rights complaint was Ross ordered removed from the classroom.

Today, Ross works for the board as an administrator.

"Why did a parent have to take such drastic action? Where was the school board?" Farber asked.

Years of complaints about Fromm, who has a long history of far-right activity and associations with neo-Nazi groups, were "ignored."

It was only after CJC and the Native Canadian Centre asked the Ministry of Education to issue guidelines that Fromm was removed from the classroom, Farber pointed out.

Today, Fromm teaches adult education classes.

Teaching is "a special and noble profession" and teachers are supposed to be role models, Farber said.

The Jewish community has "not reached a level of comfort [in believing that] school boards and teachers' unions will effectively deal with the rare case of a public school teacher who is an admitted and public bigot," he said.

An Ontario College of Teachers would act as a public complaints bureau and help protect minority children "from the Keegstras and Rosses of this world."

HOLOCAUST AND RACIAL INTOLERANCE

Micheline Joseph's grade 6 class at Bayview Fairways Public School recently held a special parent night program on the Holocaust and racial intolerance. Through art, literature, drama and song, the children expressed their thought and comments against racism and the atrocities in the world past and present.

About 90 young people demonstrated last week outside the Polish consulate in Toronto to protest recent develpments in Auschwitz. Seen here are Faye Rodzynek of Anti-Racist Action and Mitch Belfer of Canadian Young Judaea. The sign, in Hebrew, reads, "It is forbidden to forget."

to protest the ban on construction of the mall.

Those events, coupled with the continuing controversy over a large cross at a Carmelite convent near the camp, have led to criticism of the Polish church, of the administrators of Auschwitz and of Polish regional officials for allowing the mall to go ahead.

Last week's Toronto protest was co-sponsored by Betar-Tagar, Bnei Akiva, BBYO, Canadian Young Judaea, Free Torah High School, Habonim Dror, Hebrew Culture Club, Israeli Students Union, Jewish Campus Services, Jewish Student Federation, Jewish Student Union, Jewish Students Network, NCSY, Ryerson Hillel, Seneca Hillel, Tzabar and Yavne Olami. Members of Anti-Racist Action (ARA) participated in the event.

Library board apologizes for meeting on Passover

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — The City of Vaughan's Public Library Board apologized last week for holding a meeting on the first night of Passover.

"To those who were offended, we offer our most sincere and unequivocal expression of regret, and we are sorry," library board chair Eileen Burrell told a packed board meeting last Thursday night.

Burrell explained that the date for the April 3 meeting had been set a week earlier and that Jewish members had been notified. She said no concerns were relayed to the board. As well, the meeting dealt with a single "procedural item" and no public deputations were heard.

The meeting's timing stirred controversy and anger, and Vaughan Ward 5 councillor Bernie Green demanded that the board extend a "formal apology" to the Jewish community.

In an earlier letter to Green, Burrell said the city's calendar "does not indicate any religious observance on April 3, but does on April 4."

Pleas from both Green and Mayor Lorna Jackson to cancel the meeting were "ignored," Green charged, "in total disagreement with council's intent not to hold meetings on important religious and/or cultural days."

The meeting's date prevented the attendance of Jewish residents, who believed the fate of Gallanough library would be discussed, he added.

Green called the board's apology "wishy-washy but acceptable" and said he will not pursue the matter.

Of greater concern, however, to local residents is the scheduled April 27 closing of Gallanough, located in a Jewish section of Thornhill.

Board members voted to ask the city for an extra $200,000 to keep the small library open. Green told The CJN the money exists "in the overall budget" and added he's confident the city and the board are "moving toward some solution" on Gallanough.

Shul exhibit captures life of Ethiopian Jews

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — While the plight of Ethiopian Jewry is, happily, no longer on the community's must-do list, an exhibit of artifacts and photographs depicting the Jews of Ethiopia, now at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, is a must-see.

Entitled Faith and Survival: Ethiopian Jewish Life, 1983-1992, the exhibit opened last week with a featured talk by Baruch Tegegne, a well-known Ethiopian Jewish activist in Montreal, who chronicled his amazing trek out of Ethiopia, across Africa, and finally, to Canada.

Clustered in showcases in the synagogue's foyer is an impressive array of ceramics, clay figures, musical instruments, textiles, religious tracts, even a genuine horsehair fly whisk — everyday objects of a people who lived simply but tenaciously clung to their faith for centuries, despite hostile forces from within and complete isolation from the Diaspora.

But the real story is in the shul's Brotherhood Hall, where 48 outsized color photos tell the tale of a people who, despite drought, famine, disease and squalid refugee camps, believed they had a destiny — to reach the Promised Land.

The photos, taken between 1983 and 1992, are divided into three sections to correspond to the three distinct environments in which Ethiopian Jews found themselves in that nine-year period: the traditional villages in Gondar province, the over-crowded refugee camps in neighboring Sudan, and finally, the capital, Addis Ababa, just prior to Israel's miraculous airlift, known as Operation Solomon.

The pictures of the centuries-old villages and their revered kessim (rabbis) also show some of the projects organized and developed by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. (Some smaller shots taken in Israeli absorption centres show people who had been photographed earlier in their villages).

The photos of the refugee camps are within a small time frame, 1983-84, and show some of the typical diseases and the camps' dreadful conditions.

The third section is devoted to the 1990-91 period in Addis Ababa, where some 22,000 Jews had streamed, awaiting emigration. The death rate at one point was 39 a month, but they never lost faith, and their dream came true in May 1991, when almost all of them were airlifted by Israeli cargo planes in just 20 hours.

One photo from the exhibit shows two kessim (Ethiopian rabbis) from the remote town of Quara who went to Gondar to discuss plans for immigrating to Israel.

These beautiful and dramatic pictures were taken by U.S. photographer Peggy Myers, while the accompanying text was written by her husband, Ted Myers, a doctor who organized medical programs in Addis Ababa in 1990-91. The exhibit is on loan from the renowned Judah L. Magnes Museum in Berkeley, Cal.

Of note will be a lecture on April 30 by Barbara Ribicoff, director of the North American Conference for Ethiopian Jewry, entitled Israel: the New Crisis.

The exhibit continues to June 21.

Yom Hazikaron

On the 4th day of Iyar, Yom Hazikaron, we bring to the surface of our lives the stirrings that we carry deep in our hearts: the precious memories of Israel's fallen soldiers, the men and women – sons and daughters, husbands and wives, comrades and friends – who have died for Israel. In the silence of our minds, we thank them and seek God's eternal blessing upon their souls for the debt we can never repay.

On June 28, 1967, less than three weeks after the end of the Six Day War, in the amphitheatre high atop Mount Scopus in reunited Jerusalem, the Chief of Staff of Israel's Defence Forces, Major-General Yitzhak Rabin, spoke about the unique and special character of the IDF.

"The units which penetrated the enemy lines after hours of battle struggled on, refusing to stop, while their comrades fell to the right and to the left of them. These units were carried forward, not by arms or the techniques of war, but by the power of moral and spiritual values ... Our soldiers prevailed, not by the strength of their weapons, but by their sense of mission, by their consciousness of the justice of their cause, by a deep love of their country and by their understanding of the heavy task laid upon them: to ensure the existence of our people in their homeland, and to affirm, even at the cost of their lives, the right of the Jewish people to live its life in its own state, free, independent and in peace."

Nineteen years earlier, at 4:30 p.m. Sabbath eve, the 5th day of Iyar, 5708, in the Tel Aviv Museum, David Ben-Gurion proclaimed the establishment of the State of Israel to the People's Council sitting before him, to the Jewish people in the Yishuv, to the Jewish people throughout their dispersion and to the peoples of the world.

Even as he read the document, young men and women were falling in battle as war raged in other parts of the country.

Ben-Gurion stood at the dais, flanked by members of his provisional government. Behind him, one on each side, draped across the wall, were the flags of the nascent state. Above him hung the portrait of Theodore Herzl, his coal-black eyes steadfastly looking toward a dreamy Zionist horizon.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

In his left hand Ben-Gurion tightly clutched the paper from which he read, in firm and resolute voice, the Declaration of the Establishment of the State of Israel. The ceremony was over very quickly. In a matter of moments, new thunder clapped across the heavens and the world witnessed the irreversible return of the Jewish people to a self-governing, no-longer-helpless, sovereign history.

Jewish independence was the culmination of the desire of the people to build, to rebuild and "to be built." It thus poignantly contrasted, in every aspect, with the competing nationalities surrounding it 48 years ago and which, in significant degree, exist even to this day among the rejectionist Muslim fanatics – a desire to destroy and a hatred of one people for another.

The bombing of Lebanese civilians last week near Cana was a terrible, horrible mistake, the exception, not the norm. But Israel has the right, nay, the imperative, "to ensure its existence and to live its life in its own state, free, independent and in peace." It cannot surrender its independence or risk its existence to the people intent on its harm.

As the years have proven, those who are driven more by hatred of Jews than by love of their own, who are intent on destroying rather than on building, will always fail, even as they have failed thus far.

Only after daylight has departed from the day of remembering, and stars shine in the nighttime sky like signals lighting the way to a new chamber, does the celebration of Israel's Independence Day begin, a kiss of thanks, deeply-sorrowed, bitter-sweet, but ever so precious.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

"We, members of the people's council... hereby declare the establishment of a Jewish state in Eretz Israel, to be known as the State of Israel."

Give children the tools

In reference to your March 28 article "Racial, ethnic prejudice thriving: report" by Paul McKeague, I agree that it is important to inform the public of such hatemongering. I think, however, it would be beneficial to report as well on how such racism is being combatted. A study of the Holocaust and racial intolerance fosters understanding and tolerance amongst all children. It can make them more aware of prejudicial and stereotypical comments in their everyday life and give them tools with which to recognize and combat racism.

Our children are our future; we have to give them the tools they need to fight the evil in the world and nurture the good.

Disraeli is Lord or Earl but not Sir

Rabbi Benamou in "Making Sacrifices" (March 21) called Britain's first and, to date, only Jewish prime minister "Sir Benjamin Disraeli." The rabbi could have called him Disraeli or Dizzy (Punch's favorite) or Lord Beaconsfield or the Earl of Beaconsfield but "Sir Benjamin" is incorrect.

Another point. If Queen Victoria had talked religion with Dizzy "after he was converted to the dominant faith in England," then she would have been addressing a 13-year-old boy, since it was at the age of 13 that young Ben was baptized instead of being confirmed in the faith of his fathers.

DECLARATION OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE STATE OF ISRAEL

Eretz-Israel was the birthplace of the Jewish people. Here their spiritual, religious and political identity was shaped. Here they first attained to statehood, created cultural values of national and universal significance and gave to the world the eternal Book of Books.

After being forcibly exiled from their land, the people kept faith with it throughout their Dispersion and never ceased to pray and hope for their return to it and for the restoration in it of their political freedom.

Impelled by this historic and traditional attachment, Jews strove in every successive generation to re-establish themselves in their ancient homeland. In recent decades they returned in their masses. Pioneers, ma'pilim and defenders, they made deserts bloom, revived the Hebrew language, built villages and towns, and created a thriving community, controlling its own economy and culture, loving peace but knowing how to defend itself, bringing the blessings of progress to all the country's inhabitants, and aspiring towards independent nationhood.

In the year 5657 (1897), at the summons of the spiritual father of the Jewish State, Theodor Herzl, the First Zionist Congress convened and proclaimed the right of the Jewish people to national rebirth in its own country.

This right was recognised in the Balfour Declaration of the 2nd November, 1917, and re-affirmed in the Mandate of the League of Nations which, in particular, gave international sanction to the historic connection between the Jewish people and Eretz-Israel and to the right of the Jewish people to rebuild its National Home.

The catastrophe which recently befell the Jewish people-the massacre of millions of Jews in Europe – was another clear demonstration of the urgency of solving the problem of its homelessness by re-establishing in Eretz-Israel the Jewish State, which would open the gates of the homeland wide to every Jew and confer upon the Jewish people the status of a fully-privileged member of the comity of nations.

Survivors of the Nazi holocaust in Europe, as well as Jews from other parts of the world, continued to migrate to Eretz-Israel, undaunted by difficulties, restrictions and dangers, and never ceased to assert their right to a like of dignity, freedom and honest toil in their national homeland.

In the Second World War, the Jewish community of this country contributed its full share to the struggle of the freedom and peaceloving nations against the forces of Nazi wickedness and, by the blood of its soldiers and its war effort, gained the right to be reckoned among the people who founded the United Nations.

On the 29th November, 1947, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz-Israel; the General Assembly required the inhabitants of Eretz-Israel to take such steps as were necessary on their part of the implementation of that resolution. This recognition by the United Nations of the right of the Jewish people to establish their State is irrevocable.

This right is the natural right of the Jewish people to be masters of their own fate, like all other nations, in their own sovereign State.

Accordingly We, Members of the People's Council, representatives of the Jewish Community of Eretz-Israel and of the Zionist Movement, Are Here Assembled on the Day of the Termination of the British Mandate Over Eretz-Israel and, by Virtue of Our Natural and HIstoric Right and on the Strength of the Resolution of the United Nations General Assembly, Hereby Declare the Establishment of a Jewish State in Eretz-Israel, to Be Known as the State of Israel.

David Ben Gurion proclaims to the Jewish people and to the people of the world the creation of the State of Israel. [Frank J. Scherschel photo, LIFE World Library]

We Declare that, with effect from the moment of the termination of the Mandate, being tonight, the eve of Sabbath, the 6th Iyar 5708 (15th May, 1984), until the establishment of the elected, regular authorities of the State in accordance with the Constitution which shall be adopted by the Elected Constituent Assembly not later than the 1st October, 1948, the People's council shall act as a Provisional Council of State, and its executive organ, the People's Administration, shall be the Provisional Government of the Jewish state, to be called "Israel."

The State of Israel will be open for Jewish immigration and for the Ingathering of the Exiles; it will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all inhabitants; it will be based on freedom, justice and peace and envisaged by the prophets of Israel; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture; it will safeguard the Holy Places of all religions; and it will be faithful to the principles of the Carter of the United Nations.

The State of Israel is prepared to cooperate with the agencies and representatives of the United Nations in implementing the resolution of the General Assembly of the 29th November, 1947, and will take steps to bring about the economic union of the whole of Eretz-Israel.

We Appeal to the United Nations to assist the Jewish people in the building-up of its State and to receive the State of Israel into the comity of nations.

We Appeal – in the very midst of the onslaught launched against us now for months – to the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the upbuilding of the State on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation in all its provisional and permanent institutions.

We Extend our hand to all neighbouring states and their peoples in an offer of peace and good neighbourliness, and appeal to them to establish bonds of cooperation and mutual help with the sovereign Jewish people settled in its own land. The State of Israel is prepared to do its share in common effort for the advancement of the entire Middle East.

We Appeal to the Jewish people throughout the Diaspora to rally round the Jews of Eretz-Israel in the tasks of immigration and upbuilding and to stand by them in the great struggle for the realization of the age-old dream – the redemption of Israel.

Placing Our Trust in the Almighty, We Affix Our Signatures to This Proclamation at This Session of the Provisional Council of State, on the Soil of the Homeland, in the City of Tel-Aviv, on This Sabbath Eve, the 5th Day of Iyar, 5708 (14th May, 1948).

An unusual election campaign

The Israeli election campaign is heating up as the clock ticks towards May 29. While television advertising is permitted only in the last weeks of the campaign, the war of words is escalating, with distinctive Israeli characteristics such as billboard advertising and a proliferation of creative bumper stickers.

By Shira Herzog

This election campaign is unlike any other — primarily due to the new system of direct elections for the prime minister. The Labor-Likud contest has been personalized to the extreme, and the competition for votes is a contest between the leaders of the two parties — Shimon Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu.

The campaign is also unprecedented in its key issues. With a process of negotiations with the Palestinians underway and the beginnings of talks with the Syrians, Israeli voters are being asked to vote between two apparent options — a continuation of the Oslo process by a Labor-led government, and a different, as yet unclear, alternative represented by Likud. But in an effort to attract the undecided voters, the line between the two parties is being blurred by the "spin-doctors" on both sides. And so, the Labor campaign is emphasizing security, while the Likud campaign is emphasizing peace ...

Having observed the election campaign firsthand over the last several weeks, I am struck by three unusual phenomena.

The first is the American-style, virtual presidential campaign run by Netayanhu, whose strength has always been sound-bites and brief, pithy statements that are attractive to the media. In an ideological society whose politicians fight for media attention based on policy proposals, Netanyahu stands out in his efforts not to get trapped in substantive debates, while repeating a few basic points that by now have a familiar ring. When pressed for policy alternatives, Netanyahu prefers to evade the issues, while reiterating his opposition to the incumbent government's policies.

A second unusual phenomenon is the extent to which public opinion polls are driving this campaign and its agenda. The Likud is stressing its commitment to peace, because the polls are saying that the public wants the process to continue. Therefore, while critical of the "Oslo process," the Likud needs to be perceived as prepared to continue negotiations. The Labor government's polls have indicated the public's feeling that the party may be soft on security (ironic, in light of the number of ex-generals in the top 10 slots of the party list). Therefore, the Labor campaign is stressing its commitment to security. The numbers of undecided voters were also a factor in Peres' controversial decision to commit the final agreement with the Palestinian Authority to a referendum. While he was also driven by an intra-party agenda — to avoid the need for an all-out debate on the contours of the final agreement — a central motivation was to appeal to those voters who are supportive of the peace process but hesitant about the terms of the deal.

A third unusual phenomenon is the extent to which external involvement in the campaign has been invoked. After the rash of bombings in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv two months ago, Peres accused Hamas of striving to defeat the Labor movement so as to halt the peace process. Last week, at the height of the Katyusha attacks on northern Israel, he claimed that Iran wanted to defeat the party that is committed to peace. In an unprecedented statement, the chief of military intelligence supported this assessment and said that Iran's support for terrorist groups is presently aimed at the May election and at halting the peace process. When U.S. President Bill Clinton came to Israel in a show of solidarity after terrorist bombs had killed 58 Israelis, cynical observers in Likud claimed that this visit was meant to shore up the Labor party's fortunes.

In a close race, the long arm of Hamas and Hezbollah may indeed affect the outcome. Netanyahu knows this, but he cannot be perceived as wishing it. Therefore, he has publicly supported the government in its response to Hamas bombings and Hezbollah attacks. Peres knows this, but he cannot be perceived as being held hostage by terrorist groups. Therefore, he has tried to strike a balance between a continued commitment to the process and a hard line against terrorism.

Over the next few weeks, Labor will continue to emphasize Peres' track record as the most experienced political leader in Israel today. Likud will contine to question the government's policies, but will emphasize its own commitment to peace and security. The long shadow of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination will likely prevent the rhetoric from escalating to its historic, feverish pitch. And on May 29, the die will be cast.

Leah Rabin's visit to Canada

Now that the Israeli elections are only a few weeks away, the political climate there and in the Diaspora has heated up to such a degree that even the use of words is affected. Mention "peace" and you will find proponents on the left and right become highly irritable and claim that you have injected politics into an otherwise neutral topic. That is another way of saying that reasoned debate has become almost impossible — bringing up for me some terrible memories of 40 years ago when, during McCarthy era, every word one spoke in public was scrutinized for sinister and possibly dangerous implications.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

It is not surprising, therefore, that the forthcoming Canadian visit of Leah Rabin widow of the murdered Israeli prime minister, is seen by some as a political event. It is important to point out that it is nothing of the kind.

She comes to Canada in support of the Rabin Scholarship Fund for the Advancement of Peace — something that has little to do with political objectives, past or current, but with the systematic investigation of what peace is, how parties arrive at it and how they come to confront each other when they fail to reach agreement. It is, in other words, a fund for scholarly investigation and appropriately, it is to be established at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, which has been and will remain a non-political institution.

Yet there are Jews who will have nothing to do with anything that bears the name of Yitzhak Rabin, especially not when his widow (who has always been known to speak her mind) is associated with it. Unfortunately, emotion all too often hampers good judgment. Non-Jews, whose eyes are not clouded by such emotion, have readily supported the objectives of the fund. In fact, they have contributed generously and in quite unprecedented fashion.

The scholarship fund will feature two components. Each year, based on outstanding research and/or involvement in the study of peace throughout the world, a person of international acclaim will be chosen to serve as the Rabin Scholar at the Hebrew University.

The balance of the revenue generated on an annual basis will be awarded in the form of scholarships to graduate students of political science, international relations, economics, law or other areas relating to the study of peace. In special recognition of the Canadian impetus for the creation of this fund, at least one scholarship per year will be made available to a Canadian student committed to graduate studies in one of the requisite disciplines.

Whatever people think or thought of Rabin's policies, he was the prime minister of the Jewish state, and all Jews — of whatever persuasion — fervently wanted then, as they want now, nothing more than peace (though they disagreed then and do now on what this entails). Therefore, a fund devoted to the possibilities of peace is a profoundly Jewish and universal project.

Alcohol use lower among Jews

One of the great stereotypes about Jews is that "they do not drink." Or more precisely, that they drink less than non-Jews. In fact, this stereotype is essentially true.

By Morton Weinfeld

One of the earliest findings of the social scientific study of Jewish life was that the rate of alcoholism among North American Jews was far less than that among non-Jews. Recent studies have confirmed that the gap persists. To be sure, Jews have never been abstainers and the prohibitionist sentiments never caught on among Jews — possibly because the problem of "demon rum" was not seen as grave in Jewish populations. In any case, American Jews have a rate of alcoholism between one-seventh and one-fifth that of the general population.

Some years ago, a UN agency released a study ranking some 30 countries by per capita alcohol consumption. The data included wine, liquor and beer. Israel ranked second to last, many times below the consumption rates of the European countries who ranked at the top. The Israeli Arabs, overwhelmingly Muslim — and thus likely abstainers — comprise one-sixth of the population. They would naturally lower the rate. But their weight in the population alone cannot explain the low national Israeli pattern.

Of course, one does not need scientific studies to establish the fact. Ask professional bartenders — as I have — about the relative amounts to be ordered for a "Jewish" affair compared to a similar non-Jewish party. They know. Comedian Jackie Mason's quips ring true. In his words, after a show, Jews are likely to ask, "Do you want to go out to eat?" and gentiles, "Do you want to go for a drink?"

To be sure, Jews today are drinking more than in the past, socially and at home. There are more Jewish alcoholics. This is largely a result of assimilation. But even if the Jewish-non-Jewish gap is narrowing, it remains impressive. Some studies have documented through careful fieldwork and observation how Jews have developed techniques for moderate social drinking. For example, they would deliberately nurse one drink for a long period of time.

How to account for this pattern of comparatively low consumption of alcohol, and certainly of alcoholism? Since there is no scientific evidence of any biological or genetic basis for the Jewish pattern, we can turn to two other theories to try to explain it.

One is rooted in Jewish religious culture. It suggests that because Jews have linked drinking to specific religious rituals and recognize its place in the celebration of holidays and simchahs, Jews have managed to demystify alcohol but at the same time avoid abuse. Drinking has its valued place, linked with holiness: kiddush on Friday night, a schnapps after davening, a l'chaim at a simchah, excess at Purim, and the four cups of wine drunk at Pesach seders. Like sex, it can be enjoyed in its proper context.

The second explanation traces Jewish sobriety to the dangerous social conditions which have historically faced Jews. A vulnerable minority like the Jews cannot afford to get drunk, lest anti-Semites take advantage. In addition, drunkeness was associated in Jewish folklore with the behavior of gentiles and/or peasants, so sobriety could be seen as an element reinforcing Jewish identity.

A more refined version suggests that in social encounters with gentiles, Jews still see themselves in what sociologist Marshall Sklare called "an ambassadorial role." Jews, because of their insecurity, might want to make the best impression possible; getting drunk might prove too embarrassing and reflect poorly on all Jews.

None of the theories are satisfactory. Many Christian groups have high levels of drinking, despite the role of wine in Christian religious ritual. And many vulnerable minority groups have high rates of alcoholism, for a variety of reasons. In any case, it is likely that eventually the drinking levels of North American Jews will match those of comparable gentiles. But it will take a long, long time.

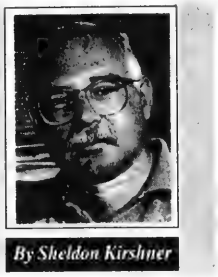
Israel expands trade with Asian nations

Israel's relationship with Asia is blossoming due to an upsurge in trade with the nations of the Pacific rim.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Israeli exports to that booming region — which have reached the $3.4 billion mark and account for 19 percent of Israel's total exports -- rose by 52 percent in 1992, by 49 percent in 1993, by 25 percent in 1994 and by 19 percent last year.

Israel's chief markets are still in Western Europe and in North America, but Asia is not far behind. Japan, for example, has become Israel's largest export market after the United States, with the annual volume of commerce having reached $2 billion (US).

The easing of the Arab-Israeli dispute is the main reason for this development. The 1991 Madrid peace process prompted China, India, Vietnam and South Korea to establish or to restore full diplomatic — and commercial — relations with Israel.

Israel widened the circle in Asia following its rapprochement with the PLO and its peace treaty with Jordan. The partial lifting of the Arab economic boycott and the liberalization of the Israeli economy were also factors.

For Israel, the peace dividend has been most keenly felt in Japan.

Heavily dependent on Middle Eastern oil, and thus eager to curry favor with the Arab world, Japan had no motivation until recently to upgrade ties with Israel.

But as tensions in the Middle East waned, Japan re-examined its attitude toward Israel. This reassessment induced Japanese manufacturers, investors and bankers to wade into the Israeli market. Politically, the situation also improved, capped by last year's unprecedented visit of Japan's prime minister to Israel.

Israel's relations with China have intensified since October 1993, when Yitzhak Rabin became the first Israeli prime minister to set foot in that country. (Israel's president, Ezer Weizman, preceded Rabin to China by nine months). Since then, Israel has opened a consulate in Shanghai — China's business capital — and signed bilateral agreements in the fields of technology, communications and agriculture.

Last September, on the very day the Oslo 2 accord was signed, the Chinese minister of foreign trade disclosed in Jerusalem that Israeli companies planned to build a hi-tech industrial park near Beijing.

The transfer of advanced military equipment from Israel to China, which began when Menachem Begin was prime minister, still accounts for a considerable turnover in trade. Last year, Chinese American human rights activist Harry Wu criticized Israel for selling weapons to China.

Taiwan's growing importance on the Asian scene has not gone unnoticed in Israel. Israel has no formal diplomatic relations with Taiwan — which is claimed by China — but of late Israeli entrepreneurs have been flocking there in search of new opportunities.

Trade between Israel and India has grown by several hundred percent since 1992. Three years ago, when he was foreign minister, Shimon Peres visited New Delhi and signed six bilateral accords. Last year, Israel and India went one step further by agreeing to grant each other Most Favored Nation status. Earlier this year, there were two additional developments. Israel's finance minister signed three bilateral agreements in India, and India's commerce minister led the first official trade delegation to Israel.

There has been progress on the political front, too. In 1993, the director-general of India's Foreign Ministry visited Israel. In 1994, the speaker of India's lower house of parliament met with Israel's leadership in Jerusalem.

Despite these milestones, the Indian government vetoed a tour of the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra to New Delhi and Bombay scheduled to have taken place in 1993.

In the meantime, South Korea has emerged as Israel's fastest growing trading partner in Asia. In recognition of this fact, Israel, which closed its embassy in Seoul in 1977, reopened it two and a half years ago.

Israel has no reason to regret its decision. Recently, the Israeli Manufacturers Association and the Korean Industrial Federation signed a cooperative agreement that is bound to boost trade.

And in the wake of a visit by South Korea's defence minister to Jerusalem last summer, the Israeli media reported that Israel was close to promulgating a deal to supply Seoul with unmanned surveillance planes.

In a major shift, Malaysia has decided to establish formal trade relations with Israel. Malayasia, however, has no immediate plans of forging political ties with Israel.

Indonesia, with the world's largest Muslim population, has quietly traded with Israel for years. But for the moment, there are no signs on the horizon that Indonesia — which Rabin secretly visited in October 1993 — is even remotely interested in establishing diplomatic relations with Israel.

Informative biographies

A cornucopia of recently-published books...

One of America's pre-eminent Jewish families is the subject of John Davis' gossipy biography, The Guggenheims (Shapolsky, $18.99 US). Davis paints a beguiling picture of the family, beginning with its 19th century patriarch, Meyer Guggenheim of Lengau, Switzerland, who stumbled into mining and made a fabulous fortune.

By World War I, the Guggenheims had cornered the world market in silver, copper, lead and nitrate. As he should, Davis concentrates on their acumen as entrepreneurs, but devotes a good part of his book to their involvement in the arts.

The story of the Warburg family, which Ron Chernow deftly documents in The Warburgs (Random House, $39), is really the history of German Jewry from the 19th century onward. The Warburgs, one of the oldest continuously active banking clans, financed German industry, influenced its politics and enriched its culture. This hefty book, which is based on Warburg family papers, is the definitive work on the topic.

Louis B. Mayer and Irving Thalberg built Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM) into a great movie studio, bathing America in an aura of romance, optimism and well-being. In the course of their 13-year collaboration, which was cut short by Thalberg's untimely death in 1937, MGM made films like The Good Earth, Mutiny on the Bounty and A Night at the Opera. Samuel Marx, an MGM writer and producer who worked with them, has written a warts-and-all memoir of their fruitful association, Mayer and Thalberg (Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $16).

Art Buchwald, the descendant of Hungarian and Austrian Jews, describes the first quarter of his life in Leaving Home (G.P. Putnam, $29.95 US). The syndicated humor columnist, whose writings appear in more than 500 newspapers, writes of his childhood in foster homes, his summer job at a hotel which barred Jewish guests, his stint in the U.S. Marine Corps (where he endured anti-Semitic taunts and an assignment in a burial detail) and his days with the Paris-based New York Herald Tribune, which propelled him into the upper reaches of American journalism.

Kehillot kodesh

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

Rabbi Joshua Hammerman wrote the following about the difference between religion and spirituality in the aftermath of Disney's hit movie Pocahontas. "Pocahontas talking to enchanted trees and living peacefully among the birds and forest animals; that's spirituality. Pocahontas receiving a dues statement from her local synagogue; that's religion."

For many Jews, synagogues seem to be what is wrong with organized religion rather than what is right.

No doubt this is part of the reason that motivated four rabbis, a cantor and a psychiatric social worker in the New York Metropolitan area to organize a company that offers freelance services to Jews in need. Advertising in the Wall Street Journal, this new agency offers to provide "a friendly, sensitive rabbi" for weddings, conversions, baby namings, bar or bat mitzvahs [sic], funeral and tombstone unveilings. Fees vary according to how much effort is involved. There is even an 800 number to call. It is sort of a shop-by-phone service where consumers can order the kind of service they want at the time they need the service, without the bother of paying dues.

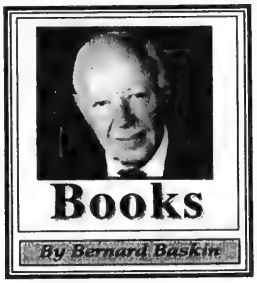
Whether this company will survive as anything more than a curiosity remains to be seen. But my hunch is that this endeavor will fail. It will fail, not because the professionals involved are incompetent or uncaring or because the fees are too steep. It will fail because it lacks the very ingredient that synagogues provide, namely, a sense of community. There is a vast difference between hiring a rabbi to perform a function and having a rabbi who knows you and your family and with whom you have an ongoing relationship. That is the benefit of being part of a community. And that same rabbi or cantor who was present at the birth and the bar mitzvah and the wedding will be present at the funeral. Moreover, when a member is hurting, there is a community that will respond. And when a member celebrates, there is a community that joins in.

The concept of community is far more permanent and important than the need which draws individuals to pay as they go. That is why Rabbi Gerald Zelizer notes that "a religious community is more than a filling station where one stops when the tank is empty but has no connection the rest of the time."

The synagogue as a caring community does more than a fee-for-service company can ever do. Many times, synagogues will provide services at reduced rates or with no fee at all. That is because the synagogue sees its collective responsibility to serve a community, not just itself. The synagogue as a spiritual community provides ongoing educational opportunities that enhance Jewish identity, even when it is not connected with any particular need for service. Its professional staff is not just present to "hatch, match and dispatch," but to teach and inspire and lead and encourage and facilitate.

Synagogues have historically been called kehillot kodesh, sacred communities. Jews who gather to support one another, to nurture one another and to challenge one another are involved in a holy task. In religious communities, there is strength and there is inspiration. That is why the future of our people will be assured through our synagogues more than any other institution or corporation.

Rabbi Allen is the outgoing president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.



Origins of Satan

The Origin of Satan by Elaine Pagels, Random House $30

How did Satan change from his minor role in the Hebrew scriptures to the Prince of Darkness of Christian thinking? How did he become the bitter enemy of God and man?

The author asserts that the idea of the world as a battleground where the forces of good contest the forces of evil is basic to Christian scripture. All four Gospel writers depict the conflicts between Jesus' followers and their Jewish enemies as a cosmic struggle between God's spirit and the power of Satan. In each succeeding Gospel account the Jews are demonized with growing intensity.

Writing during and just after the Jewish war against Rome, the evangelists attempt to exonerate the Romans — in particular Pontius Pilate — from blame for the death of Jesus, in order to incriminate Jews and ingratiate themselves with Roman authority. Unhappily, they left a deadly legacy to subsequent generations of Christians who found validation for their persecution of Jews through the centuries.

Pagels points out that "Many religious people who no longer believe in Satan ... nevertheless are influenced by this cultural legacy whenever they perceive social and political conflict in terms of the forces of good contending against the forces of evil in the world." This demon will not go away.

She indicates, in all fairness, that many Christians — from the first century through Francis of Assisi in the 15th century and Martin Luther King, Jr. in the 20th — believed that they stood on God's side without defaming their opponents. They prayed for the reconciliation — not the damnation — of those who opposed them. "For the most part, however, Christians have fought — and acted upon — the belief that their enemies are evil and beyond redemption."

In Jewish tradition, Satan, is a mythical symbol for evil, often identified with the tempter, the negative impulse that prompts us to comply with the worst side of our nature. But Judaism is so strictly monotheistic that it resists the temptation to enthrone any force or being other than God — even for the realm of evil.

In the Book of Job, Satan does appear as an adversary who brings about Job's misery. But Talmudic sages regard this account as more allegory than fact.

Maimonides, ever the rationalist, equated Satan with a person's evil inclination (the yetzer harah). For him, it was the only explanation for the mystical incarnation of evil. In Jewish folklore, however, Satan is depicted as a malign figure who hates Jews and brings their faults before the heavenly throne. It is true to say, however, that Satan occupies almost no place in modern Jewish theology.

The author, a professor of religion at Princeton University, suffered the loss of her husband and young son over a 15-month period. This prompted her to search the scriptures for a clue about how people, throughout history, have dealt with evil. "I began to reflect," she says, "on the ways that various religious traditions give shape to the invisible world and ... on the various ways that people from Greek, Jewish and Christian traditions deal with misfortune and loss."

Although her thesis is hardly original and other recent books have dealt with it more forcefully, Pagels has the rare talent of making difficult subject matter accessible to intelligent readers. This study, concerned with the shaping of early religious ideas, also helps us understand the power of irrational forces that still confront us in contemporary society.

Survival was a miracle

By NATHAN SHUMSKI

Guest Voices

At the time of the Nazi invasion, in November 1939, I fled Poland in the hope of surviving the war in the land of the "proletarian social revolution," the Soviet Union. The fact that I am still alive some 50 years later is testimony to a series of extraordinary and unbelievable events that could only be called miracles or, in Yiddish, nissim.

I experienced these "miracles" in a number of Soviet prison camps, as well as after my release from those camps.

In June 1940, I was arrested as a Polish refugee in the city of Pinsk. Germany and Russia had agreed to divide what was then the Republic of Poland and Pinsk had come under Russian control. Perhaps 50 percent of the people who lived there were Jewish. The Russians suspected any Polish subjects as possible spies or saboteurs and consequently imprisoned about 250,000 people.

At first, we were put in jail, where we remained for three months. We were interrogated repeatedly, very often at night. Finally, the Russians sent all the prisoners away to the woods in northern Russia near the Finnish border. It took three months and we travelled by train (in sealed box cars), by truck and by river barge.

I was assigned to a brigade whose task was to cut down the huge trees of those wild forests. Each brigade lived in its own barracks made of rough lumber; inside we slept on three-tiered platforms also made of unfinished boards. There were no mattresses or blankets.

Every morning at 6 a.m., we were ordered to leave the barracks and run to the kitchen where we were given our ration of soup in exchange for coupons we had received the night before. This soup consisted of warm, dirty water with some grass or tiny salted herring. At 7 a.m., every brigade had to be assembled near the camp gate. There we received our work tools — saws and axes — from the tool "magazine," lined up in columns, four across, and prepared to leave the camp. We were under heavy guard, the soldiers equipped with rifles with fixed bayonets.

Just as we were to depart, the head guard would shout, "One step to the right, one step to the left of the column and we will shoot without warning."

We marched for 1½ to 2 hours to cover a distance of from five to eight kilometres to reach the assigned work place. When a person in the brigade grew weak and collapsed, they disappeared, never to

Hebrew on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Eliezer Ben Yehuda would have been amazed by the Internet. Ben Yehuda is credited with being the inspired and obstinate visionary responsible for the rebirth of the Hebrew language in modern times. A century ago, he took the ancient language and developed the words and terminology that make Hebrew a vibrant language in Israel and now ... on the Internet.

Setting up your computer to surf the Net in Hebrew requires a bit of work. But it is well worth the effort. In this column, I will go over some of the basic principles of loading Hebrew onto your Internet browser and will point you to the sites on the Internet where you will find clear, detailed instructions.

I have successfully installed Hebrew in Netscape for Windows 3.1, Windows 95 and Macintosh. I have also done the same for Internet Explorer for Macintosh. I hope you won't encounter any difficulties.

First a bit of background.

When you type the letter "a" on your computer and send it off on the Internet, every other computer will recognize your "a" because of worldwide standards. Every font has room for upper- and lower-case letters, numbers, punctuation and even some specialized characters like £, ∞ and ∑.

But what happens if you want to read the letter "aleph" on the Internet? Most of us really don't need fonts with characters like £, ∞ and ∑. So new fonts have been created where rarely used characters have been replaced by the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. When a Web page is created using this font, and a similar one is installed on your computer, you will be able to read Hebrew on the Jewish Highway.

And since common English letters like "a," "b" and "c" are untouched, you can use these new fonts to display Hebrew and English simultaneously.

In order to teach your browser Hebrew, you'll need to follow three basic steps:

- Download the new font from the Internet;
- Install it onto your computer;
- Tell your Internet browser to make use of this new font.

For a Windows PC running Netscape, go to [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/pc] and read Part I of the README file [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/pc/README] for detailed instructions on how to download and install Hebrew fonts. Download the "NeText" [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/pc/netext.exe], "WebHebrew" [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/pc/webfont.exe] or "ElroNet" [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/pc/elrofont.exe] fonts. You can download all of them and choose the one that looks best to you. Now follow the rest of the README instructions.

For a Macintosh running Netscape 2.0, go to [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/mac]-and read the README file [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/mac/README] for detailed instructions on how to download and install Hebrew fonts. Then download the "NeText" font [ftp://ftpwww.huji.ac.il/pub/fonts/mac/NeText_for_Mac.sit]. The "WebHebrew" and "Elron" fonts are available from [ftp://ftp.ucs.ubc.ca/pub/mac/info-mac/comm/tcp/web/web-hebrew.hqx]. You can download all of them and choose the one that looks best to you. Now follow the rest of the README instructions.

A Macintosh running Netscape 1.1 or Internet Explorer 2.0 will need to use the MosaicFixed font also available at the above site [ftp://ftp.ucs.ubc.ca/pub/mac/info-mac/comm/tcp/web/web-hebrew.hqx].

As I said, you will still be able to surf the English Web with these new fonts, but the English letters may be a bit difficult to read. If you find them legible, fine. Otherwise, you may want to revert to the original browser fonts when you're not surfing in Hebrew.

So once you've done all the work, where should you browse in Hebrew? In future columns, I will focus on more Hebrew web pages, but a great place to start is the massive Hebrew University site at [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/snunit/]. You can travel through the history of Jerusalem at [http://jeru.huji.ac.il/hopen_screen.htm].

And as for Eliezer Ben Yehuda, the founder of modern Hebrew, I found a very interesting essay about the rebirth of Hebrew at [http://www.macom.co.il/hebrew].

But don't tell Eliezer the essay's in English.

Jewish victims of Nazism memorialized by community

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —They cried softly, the politician, the communal leader, the survivor, the teenager. Even the stony-faced security guard hid his face as, to the melancholy strains of Ani Ma'amin candles were lit in memory of the six million martyrs to Hitler's tyranny.

Yom Hashoah

Over 1,000 people jammed Pride of Israel to take part in the Yom Hashoah service sponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Elisabeth De Jong Feldman, Sylvia Bornstein and Tamara Stieber lit memorial candles, representing the survivors and the first and second generations; Allen Bielak the partisans; Joyce Miedema the righteous among the nations; Sam Romberg, the war veterans; and former hidden child Leonard Vis for those righteous gentiles who lost their lives for rescuing Jews.

Israel Consul General Yehudi Kinar, participating in his first Yom Hashoah service since assuming his position in Toronto, was himself a hidden child, handed over to Dutch partisans at the age of 16 months, and being lucky enough to be reunited with his parents and sister at the age of five.

"Now I represent a state that according to the Nazis and anti-Semites shouldn't be able to exist. In Bonn, from 1983 to 1988 (as a member of Israel's diplomatic corps), I confronted those in Germany, and convinced them they had failed."

Sandra Brown, president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, said that "survivors and their children sitting together to remember the Holocaust is the most profound continuity."

Minister of International Trade Art Eggleton vowed that "never again should countries — like Canada — allow this to happen."

Throughout the program, Eileen Thalenberg, Michael Lebovic, Hassida David and Allen Farkas read from poignant, tragic or dramatic writings in English, Yiddish and Hebrew of the Holocaust: "I remember a cursed night/When there were dolls left in all seven streets/Of the city. And not one child;" "We avenged your bitter and lonely death/With our strong, heavy, burning fist;" "They search, they look/Into each and every face."

In a chilling new tradition, names of Holocaust victims listed in the Hall of Memories of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto were read at the beginning and end of the program, against a backdrop of slides of pre-Hitler Europe.

Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, spiritual leader of Pride of Israel, gave the opening prayer and recited Kaddish. Synagogue cantor Charles Weinberg sang the K'El Maleh Rachamim.

The Ne'imot Singers presented musical selections and led the audience in the Partisans' Song.

Survivor's smile hides horrors from the past

TORONTO—She came up to me, I think, because she saw me crying. She said that she thought that I had been in the concentration camps or my parents had been.

"I was," she said, and pulled up her sleeve and showed me the number tattooed on her arm.

Her name is Helen Starkman, and her lovely smile belies the horror of those years in Auschwitz and Terezin. She is a musician, she told me, and plays several instruments, including the violin. Her two sons are also musicians.

She doesn't need memorial services to remember, she said. "Every minute of every day it is in my mind. I wake up at night sometimes and reach for I don't even know what."

The Nazis locked her and her fellow prisoners in a hut in Terezin for nine days, until they could get around to executing them. Then there was a knock on the door, she remembers, and a voice telling them they were free.

"We didn't believe him. He told us to look outside. We looked, and we saw people playing instruments."

They ran outside, six girls holding hands. They were starving, "like wild animals." Czech churches saved their lives, she said, by giving them pieces of bread.

She was waiting in line for her portion of bread, when an unknown woman ran up to her. "Helenka, Helenka, don't you recognize me?" It was her sister, the only member of her family who remained alive.

In an almost surreal moment, Starkman now took out a chain around her neck in the shape of a harmonica, and played David, Melech Yisroel on it. Then she began to sing — Vi ahein zoll ich gayn, Where shall I go ... when all the doors are shut to me.

"That's what it was like," she said. "No one wanted us. There was no place to go."

She and my daughter hugged, and she shook my hand, thanking me for speaking to her. But I said that we were the ones honored by her having spoken to us.

She said that she doesn't believe in miracles any more. But as we went out of the synagogue into the sunshine, thinking of her words, and the harmonica, and the song, it was hard not to think that that experience itself was a miracle.

Int'l court needed to preserve camps: Weiss

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An international court is needed to protect Auschwitz "and other places of horror," from projects such as a shopping mall or from desecration by a meeting at the camp of hundreds of neo-Nazis.

That was the declaration of Rabbi Avi Weiss of New York, national president of AMCHA, at a Yom Hashoah community Holocaust Remembrance gathering at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue April 16.

Yom Hashoah

"We dare not be silent about this violation of the largest cemetery in the world," said Rabbi Weiss, the activist who brought the existence of a convent at Auschwitz to world attention with a personal protest that led to his being beaten at the site.

He unfurled a large banner he said he had picked up recently at the site of the former convent. In Polish it read, "Protect the Carmelite Sisters from attacks by Jews and Freemasons."

If Poland violates international law by allowing commercial development near Auschwitz, then it should be excluded from NATO, Rabbi Weiss said.

He encouraged those present to advocate the passing of a resolution by Canadian politicians similar to one adopted by the U.S. House of Representatives deploring the actions at Auschwitz.

"Israel is in a quasi-war [with Lebanon], but this time we can defend ourselves," he said.

As a Jewish activist, Rabbi Weiss said he was not one of those who wondered why there was no resistance by Jews against the Nazi onslaught. Instead he was surprised to learn how many less well-known forms of resistance there were by Jews.

"It was the silence of the world which broke their spirit. If this is the world you can have it, is what they said."

Minchah and Maariv preceded and followed the commemoration. Six memorial candles, each representing one million Jews killed, were lit by Jack Engel, Ruth Gelber, Magda Hilf, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Samson, Mr. and Mrs. Alex Hecht and Mr. and Mrs. Geza Weinberger.

Also taking part were Rabbi Moshe Stern and Cantor Joseph Lebovic of Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue and Arnold Friedman, president of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, which sponsored the gathering.

Jerusalem 3000 Maccabia Games set to begin

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jerusalem 3000 Maccabia Games will kick off next week under the auspices of The Canadian Zionist Federation, United Jewish Appeal and Youth and Hechalutz.

Softball teams from local Jewish youth organizations will compete during the month of May; finals will be held May 26 behind the Centennial Arena on Finch Avenue West following the Community March for Israel.

Each team will also prepare a dramatic presentation on the theme of Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary.

The kick-off event, which is open to the public, will include a barbeque and a performance by a group of Russian gymnasts. It will be held at 5 p.m. on May 1 behind the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

For further information call 416-398-6931, extension 4.

Awards will honor students

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services will be hosting its first annual awards night honoring those students who have been active in building a Jewish community on campus.

It will take place May 9 at Milanos, 325 King St. W., at 8 p.m.

Awards will be presented to outstanding members of the various campus organizations. The evening will recognize student leadership and dedication, but it will also provide the student community an opportunity to celebrate the end of finals. For reservations, call 512-0814 by May 6.

Role of Jews in slave trade called minor

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nation of Islam representatives who say that Jews were extensively involved in the slave trade are giving out information that is "limited, inaccurate and dangerously anti-Semitic," an expert on the subject said here.

Jews played only a minor part in the slave trade according to Dr. Anthony L. MacFarlane, a black Jew, born in Jamaica, who is vice-president of Anshe Shalom Reform Congregation in Hamilton. His talk attracted an attendance of more than 100 at Beth Tzedec's sisterhood

"In the United States very few Jews were involved. When the Nation of Islam shows a poster of a Jew selling slaves, they are showing an extremely rare occasion."

When a man in the audience asked how Jews could discredit the claims of Louis Farrakhan, a Muslim and Nation of Islam leader, MacFarlane replied, "You are doing it right now. Get involved like the social action group at our own shul."

British merchants

A general practitioner in Hamilton, MacFarlane, who is a certified mohel, came there from Jamaica in the 1950s and at the Beth Tzedec meeting he welcomed Lillian and Manny Zacks who invited him for his first Shabbat dinner. The Zacks now live in Toronto.

The activist physician said he has a warm spot in his heart for Beth Tzedec because as a medical student at the University of Toronto he attended services there in 1962 and was invited to dinner by a congregant who also came out to hear his talk.

In the discussion period, he said slavery still exists in Arab lands and in sweatshops in the Far East where people are sold into slavery. "It is not a fashionable subject but slavery is alive and well in the world."

MacFarlane gave a lengthy and detailed account of the history of the slave trade and outlined why, for geographic and economic reasons, few Jews were involved in it.

A generally accepted figure is that 11.5 million slaves were transported from Africa between 1570 and 1840, he said.

British traders accounted for the largest part of this figure (40 percent) but the Sephardi Jews in England were not involved because in those days they were fearful of their status (they were admitted on sufferance by Oliver Cromwell in the late 17th century)and they did not have the proper connections to take part.

When the Dutch established colonies in the New World and the West India Company became active in the slave trade, about eight to nine percent of investment in the company was by Jews. "But the rate of Jewish investment in other Dutch commercial ventures was 80 percent," he said. "It was not considered desirable to invest in the West India Company."

There was involvement by Jews in the slave trade in the islands of Curacao and Surinam off the north part of South America at the end of the 18th century, he said. "Jews were not allowed to buy and sell slaves but they were involved in the providing of money for the trade. At that time it was considerd proper to own slaves."

In the Caribbean, up to 1750, from 1.5 to three percent of the ships engaged in slaves were owned by Jews, he said, and after that conditions in the trade changed and slaves were allotted to consignees to be sold. Jews made up eight percent of the consignees.

In the United States, where Jews lived mostly in the urban centres not on plantations, they owned from one to 1.5 percent of the number of slaves.

"The record of Jews in the slave trade is not something hidden," MacFarlane said. "Jewish historians have writen about it extensively. It is extremely well documented."

MacFarlane was introduced by Judi Kauffman, vice-president in charge of outreach.

How to give forever.

The way I look at it, giving deserves just as much planning as any other financial activity. Because when I give, I want to know that my money will work as hard as possible and as long as possible to support the community. That's why my wife, Jillian Townsend, and I put a lot of thought into how we wanted to give to Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital.

Our idea was to set up a charitable trust fund.

Working with the people at Mount Sinai, we designed the trust to support medical research. The beauty of a trust is that it keeps on giving: the capital will generate interest income for the hospital in perpetuity. And you don't need to be a Rockefeller to set one up. Even modest gifts over a period of time can create a fund with real giving power when pooled with the gifts of others — to fund a hospital that does some of the best medical research in the world.

We may not be able to live forever, but our gift can.

Mount Sinai Hospital has gift planners who can work with you to customize your gift. Please call (416) 586-8203 or fax (416) 586-8639 for a free copy of YOUR ESTATE RECORD and PLANNING GUIDE.

Celebrate Jewish life for children's sake: rabbi

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Jewish children should listen attentively to survivors of the Holocaust, but they must also be taught that living a full Jewish life does not mean hearing only about hatred and suffering, said Rabbi Victor Reinstein

Yom Hashoah

Speaking at Victoria's annual Holocaust Remembrance Day at the Holocaust memorial in the Jewish Cemetery, Rabbi Reinstein of Congregation Emanu-El said the Torah states that pain and suffering are not the only doctrines of Jewish life.

"We must celebrate Jewish life, so that our children don't turn away from Judaism as a religion based on others' hate and anti-Semitism," he said.

Children must learn that the Holocaust was an example of what vicious hatred can lead to, and "We must remove hatred from their hearts."

The rabbi said that even in the hell of the Nazi death camps, there were acts of kindness. He read from a paper prepared by Rysia Kraskin, a local survivor who told of the care and help she received from a Jewish woman named Helen, in the five camps she was in. Helen eventually became the wife of survivor Willie Jacobs and the couple lived in Victoria for many years. Both died within weeks of each other last year.

Kraskin was in such notorious camps as Skarzysko, Czestochowa and Ravenstok, always walking from camp to camp and once jammed into a train's cattle car for 16 days without food or water.

"People were dying like flies because of the hard physical work and no food in the camps," she said.

They were being marched to Dachau when they were liberated by the Americans in April 1945.

She said that "even though we went through hell, we didn't forget we were human beings and how to care for others in need."

Survivors and children of survivors formed a Magen David on the memorial, using fresh flowers from the garden of Goldie Gardner, who had died the night before the memorial day. It had been Gardner's tradition to provide flowers for the annual Holocaust services and her husband Jack insisted on cutting flowers for this year's ceremony shortly after she died.

Vancouver marked Holocaust Remembrance Day with a pictorial collection of the Warsaw Ghetto at the Holocaust Education Centre. An evening of poetry, prewar Yiddish songs and ghetto music, hosted by Lillian Nemetz, a child survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto, preceded the opening of the photo exhibit. Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, former foreign minister of Poland, was a featured speaker. He was honored in 1964 by Yad Vashem for his work with Zegota, a Polish wartime movement he co-founded to help Jews.

The pictorial exhibit continues until June 7.

Interfaith program in Windsor

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Corespondent

WINDSOR — For the fourth year in a row, the Windsor Jewish community observed Yom Hashoah with an interfaith program.

The program, attended by about 400 people of all faiths at Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, had as its theme Keeping the Story Alive — an Intergenerational Dialogue.

Six candles were lit by survivors and their children and grandchildren, with each group presenting a brief vignette of a true Holocaust story.

Also taking part were the Rev. Owen Burey of Sandwich Baptist Church; Rabbi Yosil Rosenzweig of Shaar Hashomayim and Rabbi Jeffrey Ableser of Congregation Beth El; cantors Sidney Resnick and David Neumark; Alan Berger of the Windsor Jewish Federation; members of the Royal Canadian Legion Balfour Branch 362, who were presented with a Holocaust memorial plaque; the Windsor Community Choir; Peter Weibe, cello of the Windsor Symphony Orchestra; and Carmen Cavallaro, accompanist of the Windsor Community Choir.

The Yom Hashoah planing committee includes representatives from the federation, the Roman Catholic Separate school board and the public school boards; clergy, including the rabbis of the three Windsor congregations; and representatives of the City of Windsor race and ethno-cultural relations committee, the Human Rights Committee, the Windsor District Labor Council and the Hebrew Collegiate Institute.

Biblical mythology focus of art show

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

GRAND FORKS, B.C. — Vancouver artist Lillian Broca, who specializes in paintings based on Jewish biblical mythology, continues her work with a show, Celestial Beings, which highlights as her central theme the world's first feminist, Lilith.

The show, which opened at the Grand Forks Art Gallery (in the B.C. interior) in April and runs to June 1, comprises paintings and lithographs. The paintings are done on sparkled paper sanded several times to give it an ancient look. In the works, Broca uses graphics and acrylic and some collage.

Following up last year's show on "good" angels at the Zacks Gallery of the Jewish Community Centre in Vancouver, Broca's new show portrays the legend of Lilith, who, according to some stories, was created by God as Adam's first mate.

The Lilith story is mentioned in the Talmud and in various religious legends. It tells of Lilith's struggle for equality and her subsequent escape from the Garden of Eden because she felt that, having been created at the same time as Adam, she was Adam's equal, and she refused his demand that she be submissive to him.

To maintain her independence and dignity, Lilith chose loneliness over subservience and flew away from Eden, having acquired wings by uttering God's secret name.

Besides the 12 paintings in the Lilith series, the Grand Forks show also includes a new series on brides, as well as some of Broca's other works from her Angel series.

Staff entertains children as rocket attack shuts down Canada Centre

By Elana Carr

Workers at Canada Centre in Metulla, on the Lebanese border, have been turning their attention lately to keeping children busy in bomb shelters. Normal activities at the Centre were shut down by the conflict in Lebanon.

Canada Centre, housing a huge recreation complex, including an Olympic-sized skating rink, was funded, in large part, through United Israel Appeal. UIA Canada is responsible for transferring the Israel portion of UJA Federation Campaign contributions.

On Sunday, April 14th, the Centre was struck by a Hizbullah Katyusha rocket, which landed seven metres from the indoor swimming pool, causing over $1 million damage. Nobody was injured, but the Centre, a major tourist attraction, was closed, and the staff have been organizing events for the community's kids.

"We are trying to make life as normal as possible," Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg told Community Matters. "Through the help of Canada Centre, a variety of special programs was planned. One such program included a community-wide songfest for the children living in the bomb shelters. This particular event was covered by a local Israeli radio show, in hopes of raising the children's spirits."

Despite the tense situation, Goldberg is trying to keep up Metulla's morale. About 80% of the town's residents, he said, remained during the fighting. The rest left temporarily to stay with families living elsewhere in Israel.

Canada Centre not only serves area residents, it provides rest and recreation for Israeli soldiers on the northern border. The Centre is equipped with a multitude of facilities, including indoor and outdoor swimming pools, a full-sized basketball court and the famous skating rink funded by Dorothy and William Drevnig, where Israel's Olympian, Misha Shmerkin trained.

Metulla's Canada Centre suffered serious damage from a Katyusha attack.

March OF THE LIVING attracts Polish audience

Polish onlookers lined the streets to watch 5,000 March of the Living participants during their trek between concentration camp sites, according to Barbara Bank, Toronto Co-chair of the March.

"It was as if many of them felt they had to atone for the sins of past generations," Bank said, during an interview from Cracow, Poland. "In Auschwitz, we marched from 1:00 p.m. - 4:00 p.m. with the rest of the participants. It was incredible to be here among 5,000 Jewish students holding their heads high and proud, while waving their Israeli flags."

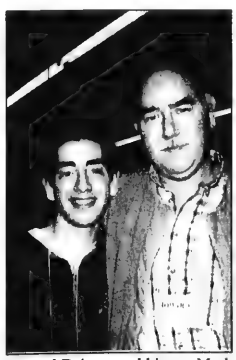
On April 13, over 100 Jewish students from the Greater Toronto Area, accompanied by 21 adults, joined 5,000 counterparts from all over the globe to share in a once-in- a-lifetime experience. On Yom Hashoa, Holocaust Rememberance Day, they marched three kilometres from Auschwitz, the largest concentration camp complex built by the Nazis, to Birkenau.

Among the chaperones were Holocaust survivors like Anita Ekstein, a hidden child during the war, who found the odyssey both difficult and exhilarating. "It was extremely hard," she said, "to be here where my family was murdered, but I am overwhelmed to be able to share this experience with our community's young people. According to the Nazis and Poles, none of us were even supposed to be alive. I am privileged and proud to be among this group."

After experiencing Poland, March participants flew to Israel for Independence Day, Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The March is sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and United Israel Appeal of Canada. It was chaired in Toronto by Roz Davidson and Barbara Bank and coordinated by UJA Federation's Karen Worb.

Toronto Rabbi Baruch Frydman Kohl, one of the March chaperones, makes a point to participants.



Howard Driman and his son Mark are both on the March of the Living.

UJA Prime Minister's Mission touring the Jewish frontier

Some of UJA Federation's top leaders are in Israel this week after a fact finding tour to Moscow and St. Petersburg.

"We want the participants to gain a greater appreciation and understanding of the trials and tribulations that the Russian Jewish community faces in their daily lives," explained Mission Chairman, David Goldstein, who is chairing the 1997 UJA Campaign. "Funds are desperately needed for Russia's 700,000 Jews who now live on the modern day Jewish frontiers," added Baruch Gur, the architect of Operation Exodus and a special emissary to UJA Federation.

Moscow and St. Petersburg are home to 40% of Russian Jewry. Mission participants visited local Jewish agencies, schools, synagogues, museums and the Kremlin. They also gained insight into the UJA Federation-supported Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and how it operates.

Baruch Gur

The message that Gur wants to get across to mission participants is "the seriousness" of the situation that is facing the Jewish community in Russia.

"There is a clear struggle," he explained, "between living in the community and building a new one in Israel. The role of the Jewish Agency is to assist in aliyah for those wanting to leave Russia and to make sure that there is a solid Jewish community for those who wish to remain."

Prime Minister's Mission members celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut in Israel and visited Canada Centre in Metulla, which Gur considered especially important "in order to demonstrate the solidarity of Toronto Jews with Jews in Israel."

Also on the Israel agenda were briefings and a first hand look at projects funded by UJA Federation.

Federation scores a hit with Jewish Toronto

Now that Jewish Toronto has made a name for itself on the Worldwide Web (http://www.feduja.org) after its March 5 debut, organizers and volunteers are shifting their cyber sights toward community building.

So far, UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto is boasting over 3,000 hits, which means the site has been visited more than 3,000 times. "Community events, and the Student Lounge are among the most popular links," says Jay Brodbar, Coordinator of the project.

"We've started, we're visible and our next step is to build a service that will integrate and bind the community," explains Art Benjamin, Chairman of the Jewish Toronto steering committee. "Suddenly people are no further away from the community than their computer."

"The key now is raising awareness about Jewish Toronto within the community and getting more people to go on line," explains Bob Cherniak, who is responsible for technical services. "The project is an ongoing operation so every day there are new ideas and new players."

In addition to a wealth of information, including a community events calendar, the latest news, community services and a youth page, Jewish Toronto is actively seeking new participants interested in appearing on the site.

"Anyone wanting to share their story is invited to contact us," says Rob Brickman, who is active in developing Web site content. "Whether it's through hosting the organization at our site or providing links to their own sites, we can help organizations get on line."

In addition to community seminars designed to introduce Jewish Toronto to potential users, a training team is available, upon request, to show individual groups how to set up shop on the net and how to update their information on line.

"We want people to feel like it's their site," explains Jennifer Cohen, one of a team of three working on the seminars.

Plans to make the site more interactive through the creation of chat lines and discussion forums are already underway.

Jewish Toronto is setting up an information booth at the Bloor JCC (Spadina and Bloor) on May 12, for Jerusalem 3000 celebrations.

The Web site was financed with a grant from UJA Federation's Endowment Fund.

Internet brings March to life OF THE LIVING

Thanks to modern technology and imaginative minds, 300 Canadian March of the Living participants will be sharing their experiences with the world.

Through video and communications equipment donated by local businesses, 18 year old Emanuel Bensimon has been transmitting the thoughts and images of March participants on the Jewish Toronto Web site. Photographs and words are being sent from Poland and Israel via modem.

Over 100 Toronto March participants are now in Israel with nearly 5,000 counterparts from around the world.

You can read about their emotions and adventures by going to http://www.feduja.org and clicking on to March of the Living.

Internet connects teens

Just as the personal computer revolutionized modern society, Jewish Toronto, UJA Federation's Worldwide Web site, has begun to change the way Jewish youth interact with each other.

Teens and young adults who feel more comfortable in front of a keyboard than a punch bowl, are discovering how the Internet can connect them to their peers as well as their community.

"The Internet is a whole techno-culture which affects the way people relate to each other," observes Emanuel Bensimon, Coordinator of Jewish Toronto's youth page. First they meet on line and then hopefully internet pals will meet in real life," Bensimon predicts.

The Student Lounge, which features an electronic magazine and a Web page gallery indexing world wide sites, is "the most dynamic area of Jewish Toronto," says Bensimon. Future plans for the youth page include on line discussions, chats and forums to make the site more interactive. Student volunteers are also working on creating a mentor system linking university and high school students and youth with seniors. "It's a great way," according to Bensimon, "for members of the community to learn from each other's experiences and help each other."

Jewish Toronto teens are forming cyber-relationships thanks to the UJA Federation Web page.

Federation President Sandra Brown is glad to see how much excitement the site has generated, especially among young people. "They're getting some great exposure to UJA Federation and other community organizations and this is important for the future of the community."

These kids are tops at topsy-turvy

Danny Friedlander

Shayna Rootman

Junior UJA is pleased to announce the first five winners of our Topsy-Turvy contest: Ilana Arje, Danny Friedlander, Moishe Romberg, Emily Teichman and Shayna Rootman.

When we asked what was wrong with the Passover picture in the last issue of junior UJA news, we received dozens of responses. We thank everyone for sending us answers and we're publishing the names and photos of the first 10 kids who found at least 10 things wrong.

Here are the correct answers. Of course, we may have missed some mistakes as well. If we did, please let us know by writing to Topsy Turvy, 4600 Bathurst St., North York, Ontario, M2R 3V2.

1) The door is off the ground.
2) The welcome mat sign is written backwards.
3) There is a shoe on the leg of the chair.
4) There is a fish outside the window.
5) The numbers on the clock are in the wrong sequence, 4,6,6,8,7.
6) There is a flower upside down in the vase.

Ilana Arje

7) Challah is on the table instead of matzah.
8) Don't drink from this wine bottle. It's upside down.
9) Watch out for those hamantashen on the Seder plate.
10) What's Megilat Esther doing on the table instead of the Hagadah?
11) Aaron is missing one part of his eye glasses.
12) With one pink shoe and one red shoe, Uri is obviously colour blind.
13) Uri is about to drink three glasses of wine instead of four.
14) The clock says 4:00 - it's too early for a Seder!

Emily Teichman

Junior UJA thanks all the participants for entering the contest. The Junior UJA Club is currently planning new events for its 700 members.

Another Mission 3000 letter

Letters from Mission 3000 participants are still arriving at the UJA Federation office. The following is typical of the sentiments expressed by participants.

Mission multiplies commitment

Imagine entering a world as foreign to you as water is to the desert. Arriving in Israel for the first time with my husband, my closest family and friends, I felt the wonderment of the Land.

Immediately, we were introduced to the people who would guide us through this Mission. Each bus was assigned "leaders" and UJA staff people who had experienced Israel before. Our bus leaders, Elaine and Alfie Lightstone, were well prepared for the tremendous journey that lay ahead with badges, games and activities. This was the first step in developing the "family" that we would become over the next ten days. Now add to this Rick Levine and Jeff Springer of UJA, with their uncanny knowledge and wit, and of course, our Israeli guide Robert, and the Mission truly began.

The administration and coordination of the accommodations, the service, the luggage transfers, the meals and the arranged functions were overwhelming. We could tell that each action had been carefully planned and even more carefully executed by Hindy Friedman and the staff. The journey and the arrangements were virtually flawless.

I really must urge everyone to experience the reality of Israel first-hand, so that all of us may know what role we can play, both at home and abroad, as fellow supporters of Israel's future.

For us as Canadian Jewish citizens, this was both a Mission and a pilgrimage. I know that I came back a more dedicated person, someone more aware of both the harsh reality and the subtle, ancient beauty of this land. My family, friends and I thank all those whose dedication and professionalism made this Mission one of the most memorable experiences of our lives. Thank you all.

Sincerely,
Judi Switzer, Thornhill

UJA's dialogue with Dylex

Dylex wants to sell its non-wholly owned stores, such as Harry Rosen, Braemar, Nu-Mode and Forsyth, carry more detailed merchandise at Biway and improve customer serv...

Those were some of the corporate insights recently supplied to UJA Federation's Fashion Division by Elliot Wahle, the company's President and C.E.O.

Wahle reported that Fairweather, located in most major shopping centres, has improved its margins with better inventory management. Fairweather and Tip Top Tailors are looking for a new president and image improvement is one of Tip Top's priorities. Wahle spoke about Dylex's major successes, including Thriftys, which is the company's most profitable chain. Its private label is the second most popular brand of jeans in Canada. Another chain which is doing well is Club Monaco, of which Dylex owns 66%. Worldwide store expansion is well underway for the Club Monaco network.

My mother Mindel's English

Morrie's mother Mindel.

Recently, Morrie Charendoff, a member of UJA Federation's Golden Givers Program, sent us this touching tribute to his mother and her unusual use of the English language.

Morrie and Evelyn Charendoff

My mother's name was Mindel and she was born in Poland. Despite the fact that she lived in Canada for almost 70 years of her life, she never quite mastered English nor lost her accent. We, in the family, never considered these traits to be drawbacks or detrimental in any way...indeed we thought them to be rather quaint and even endearing. Sometimes, when she was particularly endearing, we would often address her as "Mindele." No matter..her responses were usually spiced with quaint and funny expressions that we inevitably referred to as "Mindelisms." Now you must understand that she wasn't trying to be funny, but she managed to fracture the English language in such a way that it came out funny, and sometimes, even hilarious.

To illustrate what I mean I shall elaborate on a few "Mindelisms" and how they came into being. One day I called her on the phone. "Hi Mom, how are you today?" She replied "how should I be? You never call to find out (which of course was precisely what I was doing)..but if you want to know, I'm feeling a little under the water." I'd ask "when did you start to feel that way" (under the water that is)? "I don't know," she replied, "I was OK, then it hit me from out of the blue sky."

Mindel didn't believe in rocking the boat. 'Do what others do' was her motto...but she didn't quite say it that way...it came out like..."when in Rome, dance with the Romanians." Now if you had to keep from saying something out of turn, her admonition was to "bite your teeth."

How many 76 year-old grandmothers does anyone know who broke a finger playing basketball? That happens to be a fact. When I asked her if she was very upset when it was broken, she merely shrugged it off saying she was "cool, calm and selected."

The best was during a volleyball game. She sprained her ankle and my son Bob took her to Branson Hospital for X-rays. While waiting for the technician, Bob crossed his legs and accidentally hit her on the foot. "Oh buby, I'm sorry,!" he cried. "I didn't mean to hurt you." "Don't vorry dahlink," she replied. "I'm not from china."

During a conversation I once had with her, I remarked on how nice the weather had been lately. "Of course it is," she replied. "There's a high blood pressure system in the area." She certainly was up to date on science and meteorology. When my granddaughter was born, her mother did not have an easy time in labour, and she ended up having what Mindel referred to as a "Sicilian Operation."

Well, Mindele spent the last few years of her life at the Baycrest Terrace and passed away a few years ago with almost all her grandchildren in attendance around her bedside. She was quite a unique person; much loved and respected by all who had the good fortune to know her. She told us not accept things for what they appear to be, but to dig deeper because..as she would say.."beauty is only a skin disease."

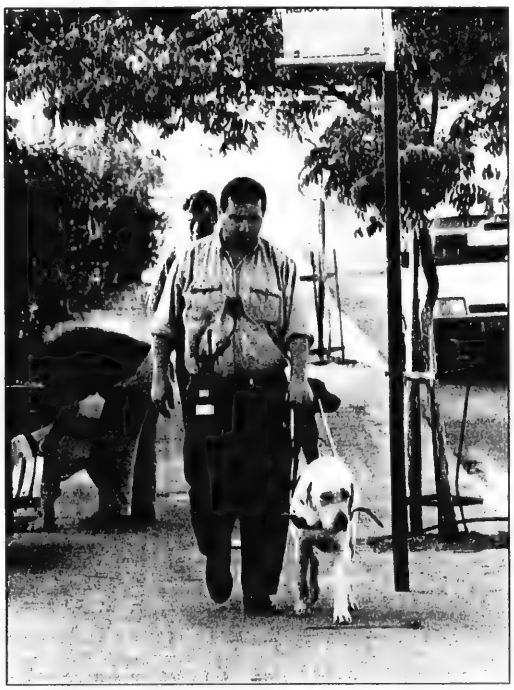
UJA Federation dollars assist the blind

A decade ago, when Michael Knafo needed a seeing-eye guide dog to help him navigate the busy streets of Tel Aviv, he was forced to go to the United States because there were no guide dog training schools in Israel. This has changed since the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency, through its budget for innovative programs, entered the picture.



Michael Knafo and his "seeing eyes" in Rehovot.

This past October, when Knafo, a 38-year-old chess teacher who has been blind for 20 years, needed a new guide dog, he boarded a bus to Beit Oved, a 20-minute ride from Tel Aviv. There, he became acquainted with Bradley, a golden Labrador Retriever, at the Israel Guide Dog Centre for the Blind.

Established five years ago by Noach Braun, a former kibbutznik with a passion for animals, the centre is one of only two guide dog training institutions in Israel. Funded in part by the Jewish Agency, the centre trains specially selected dogs to "see" for their blind owners.

The need for guide dogs, according to Braun, far outstrips supply. "There are at least 15,000 blind Israelis (some are legally blind and have some sight), but only 150 are assisted by guide dogs," he says.

One reason is cost. In order to provide blind individuals with guide dogs at no charge, the centre must absorb all breeding and training expenses in addition to the cost of a one month on-site course for blind owners and their dogs. The total: $10,000 to $15,000.

Training a guide dog is not only expensive, it's time consuming, Braun notes. The planning begins even before a puppy's birth, since guide dogs - typically Labrador Retrievers, Golden Retrievers and German Shepherds - tend to be bred for this task. Once born, the puppy spends the first year of its life with a foster family. When it reaches its first birthday, the dog is sent to the centre for six months of intensive training. Once the dog has completed the course, its prospective owner comes to the centre for a three-week "getting acquainted" workshop followed by a supervised week back home with the guide dog.

With 20 people on the waiting list at any one time, those who actually receive dogs consider themselves blessed.

"Getting my first dog changed my life completely," says Michael Knafo. "With a cane, I had to work much harder. It's very comforting to have a guide dog, because he is the active partner, enabling me to be more relaxed."

With a dog, Knafo adds, "people stop and inquire and it starts a conversation going. It's a real ice-breaker."

Documentary breaks down Jewish-Francophones barriers

Filmmaker Gary Beitel believes his award winning documentary, Bonjour! Shalom! has eased tensions between Hassidim and French Canadians in the the Montreal suburb of Outremont.

The film, recently screened for a UJA Federation Young Adult (YAD) event, focuses on a unique situation in which the fast growing Hassidic community lives among a predominately Francophone population. The rising tensions between the two communities prompted Beitel, who grew up in Outremont, to produce the movie. "When controversy arose over the Hassidic community's decision to build a new synagogue," he said, "I knew that things were getting out of hand. Charges of racism and anti-semitism came into play and this was becoming detrimental to our community."

It became apparent to Beitel that ignorance about each other and misunderstandings were at the root of the problem. "I think the film allowed the French Canadians to gain insight into the Hassidic world," he noted, "and realize that their lack of interaction... was not a result of racist attitudes or a sign of rejection, but a way to maintain and preserve their distinct lifestyle."

After the film was viewed by the French community, Beitel saw substantial improvement in the attitudes of Outremont residents and increased dialogue between the two communities. "To see the communities shed most of their intolerant attitudes towards one another and improve their neighborhood relations has been extremely rewarding for me."

UJA Federation's Community Calendar is designed to prevent event conflicts so that community members can experience the breadth of available activities.

Before planning your next speaker, social evening or fun run, call Jewish Information Service (416) 635-5600 to check and book the date. The Community Calendar, published in the Canadian Jewish News and on the UJA Federation Web site (http://www.feduja.org) will then include your function.

When in doubt, please consult.

More home day care coming

Project Sarah, an innovative program for private in-home Jewish day care is close at hand.

Funded by a UJA Federation Jewish continuity grant, Project Sarah will train members of the Jewish community to provide quality day care in a Jewish home environment for five or fewer children. "I want parents to feel comfortable about where they're leaving their children," stressed project Coordinator Cheri Szereszewski.

The 78 hour training course, which includes business and child care education and field work at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, runs from June 4 to the end of July.

There's a $100 fee to enter the course and all applicants will be checked for criminal records, at their expense, as required by the Ontario Day Nurseries Act. A current medical and results of a recent tuberculosis test are also essential.

At a recent orientation session, participant Vera Reznik, 55, said she was enthusiastic about getting involved. "I want to learn how to run my own day care business," she explained. In addition to teaching high school physical education in Israel, Reznik has worked in a nursery and as a child care assistant.

Project Sarah is jointly operated by Jewish Family and Child Service, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and Jewish Vocational Services.

B.C. revises its Human Rights Act

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Changes to the British Columbia Human Rights Act, passed April 15 by order-in-council, call for two separate administrative entities to administer the province's human rights legislation: the Human Rights Commission and the Human Rights Tribunal.

The commission will initiate and intervene in complaints "where appropriate," and take measures to address systemic discrimination; it will conduct research in relation to human rights issues and educate and inform the public with respect to its rights.

The tribunal will be an adjudicative body that holds hearings and makes final determinations on complaints. It has the authority to speed up the decisions — a long-standing complaint that the time lapse between making complaints and getting a decision often runs into a couple of years.

In adopting these measures, British Columbia is falling in line with the Canadian Human Rights Act and the legislation of several provinces. But British Columbia is the only jurisdiction in Canada in which the same agency, the B.C. Human Rights Council, both investigate complaints and holds hearings. British Columbia has also been the only province lacking the ability to initiate or intervene in a complaint to represent public interest.

Under the new system, the Human Rights Council becomes the B.C. Human Rights Commission. The name of the Human Rights Act will be changed to the Human Rights Code "to reflect its comprehensive nature."

Legislation covering these changes was passed last July, acting on a report from Prof. Bill Black of the University of British Columbia, who reviewed the entire B.C. human rights system and brought in his report in December 1994. Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, had considerable input into Black's report.

The positions of chief commissioner of the commission and chair of the tribunal will be filled by nationwide competition, says Attorney General Ujjal Dosanjh.

Dr. Michael Elterman, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region, said his organization is pleased that the Human Rights Act changes have been proclaimed into law.

"We applaud the B.C. government for passing this long overdue legislation," he said. "Together with other community organizations, Congress strongly advocated the need to review B.C.'s Human Rights Act by examining content and administration through an open and public process. The region commended the review when it was undertaken by Prof. Bill Black. We believe the government now takes a much needed step to set limits to expedite the processing and hearing of complaints ... The new structure has the potential to enhance efficiency and administrative fairness in the protection and enforcement of human rights in the province."

Thanks for the memories

SUDBURY, Ont. — A Shabbat weekend visit to Sudbury at the invitation of the city's Shaar Hashamayim Congregation rekindled for Toronto Rabbi Joseph Kelman memories of his first synagogue post in Sherbrooke, Que., 40 years ago.

"I felt a great affinity for the synagogue and the community in Sudbury," said Rabbi Kelman. "I recalled the spirit of Agudath Achim Synagogue and the 100 or so Jewish families living in the Quebec city, and found a similar dedication and vitality in the Sudbury community."

The visit of Rabbi Kelman, currently on a sabbatical from Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto, was arranged and organized by Gary Levine, senior educational consultant of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and Judi Cartman, a Congress regional officer and vice-president of the congregation.

There is no rabbi currently serving the 25 families in her community, Cartman said.

In Sudbury, Rabbi Kelman conducted services, discussed the observance of Passover, spoke to the community about its concerns, met with members of the city's Interfaith Council at the University of Sudbury's Theological Centre and was interviewed by the Sudbury Star newspaper. It was his first visit to the city.

During conversations with members of the community, he heard their concerns about continuity because of their small numbers, said Rabbi Kelman, who has served for 37 years at Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda. He expressed admiration "for the perseverance and commitment of the community [in attempting] to retain both its identity and kashruth."

Cartman reported that the congregation had received very positive feedback on the visit of Rabbi Kelman and his wife Ruth. She said Congress has arranged for a Shabbat visit in May by Martin Lockshin, a professor of religion at York University.

MNA seeks apology

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Premier Lucien Bouchard took a "step in the right direction" when, in commenting last week for the first time on the recent furor over Passover food being pulled from shelves, he called it an "unfortunate incident," D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman said.

However, Bergman continues to believe that since the actions took place just before Passover, the Jewish community was "deliberately targeted" by the Office de la Langue Francaise (OLF).

"What I do want is an apology," Bergman told The CJN.

"I'm not critical of the meeting that took place [between the Jewish community and the OLF].

"But I'm also not interested in sitting down with them and working things out, until there's an exemption made for Passover foods. Period.

"It's a question of human rights and dignity. And those are not negotiable," he said.

During question period in the National Assembly last week, Bergman and Liberal MNA Pierre Paradis peppered the government with a series of questions about the OLF's actions, with Bergman underscoring the "considerable distress" they caused to members of the Jewish community.

Bouchard and Louise Beaudoin, the minister responsible for the French Langage Charter, expressed optimism that a solution would be found to exempt the Jewish community in the future.

"It's necessary to consider this in the context of existing law," Bouchard told the Assembly.

"We think that there is, under present arrangements, the mechanism to bring about the required exemptions.

"There are discussions that are already underway," he said, "and I will see for myself if they are succeeding quickly."

Earlier, Bouchard reacted angrily at a suggestion by Bergman that the OLF's "rigid and preemptory" actions caused Quebec Jews to feel "unwelcome in Quebec society."

Bouchard called such a characterization "completely unacceptable."

However, the premier called the affair, "an unfortunate incident, one which we regret," and attributed it to those "at the bureaucratic level."

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן

מולדת הנאמנים:

אני מסיים סידרת הרצאות בבית החולים של לונדון אונטריו. חבר טוב מסיע אותי במכוניתו לשדה התעופה הקטן של העיר האוניברסיטאית. בדרך הוא מראה לי בגאווה מבנה גדול חסר דמיון ואומר לי שֶמֶפה יוצאת תורה לכל אונטריו ולחלקים אחרים של קנדה. מדוע? כי כאן הופכות מליוני תרנגולות כל שנה לצ'יקן נאנטס המפורסמים. אלה הן אותן תתיכות בשר עוף לבן שעטופות בבצק שומני, שבילדותינו קראו להם שניצל -עוף. עכשיו הן אחראיות לגידולם של מליוני ילדים בכל העולם. אם גם הילדים שלכם הם חלק מן הכנופיה הזו, כדאי לכם לזכור שבשר הלבן הזה אין כמעט ברזל. אם הילדים שלכם אוכלים בעיקר ג'אנק (צ'יפסים ודומיהם) ומעט ירקות טריים, סביר להניח שהם יהיו אנמיים ויסבלו מחוסר דם. כדי להיות בצד הבטוח - לא יזיק אם תתנו להם כל יום טבליה אחת של ויטאמינים שמכילה גם ברזל.

איך מונעים מנער פאלסטיני שטוף מוח מלהתאבד בהתפוצצות, כשהוא לוקח איתו כמה שיותר ישראלים? על פי ראיונות עם נערים שנתפסו טרם התאבדות, מסתבר שהרקע לפעילותם אינו בהכרח דתי-פאנאטי. ההיפך: מבטיחים להם גן עדן מלא נשים יפות, סעודות מזילות ריר ואורגיות, ונותנים בידם 7,000 דולאר שהוא סכום אגדי במושגים שלהם. כלומר: מדובר פה בסחטנות מאוד חומרנית וגופנית! ככל שזה נשמע מנעיל, דווקא התגלית הזו נוטעת בי תקווה: אם הרקע הוא כל כך חומרני, ניתן גם להשתמש בו כדי להתחיל למנוע את המעשים הנוראיים האלה. הינה דוגמאות: אם ידעו מתאבדים פוטנציאלים שבתי הוריהם יפוצצו, ושבעקבות מעשיהם יגורשו משפחותיהם - סביר להניח שהמות החומרני שלהם יעשה חושבים. אם גם זה לא יעזור (אם כי יש לי הרגשה שזה יעזור) צריך לשקול, לדעתי, צעדים יותר קיצוניים שקשה לי אפילו להעלות על הנייר: בכל מדינה ערבית ש"מכבדת את עצמה" כל מעשה התאבדות כזה היה זוכה להימחקות משפחתו של המתנקש מעל פני האדמה. זוהי שיטה ערבית שנשמעת נורא בדמוקרטיה הישראלית, אבל היא עובדת. יש לי הרגשה ששתיים שלוש תגובות כאלה יפסיקו כליל את מעשי ההתאבדות. אם אכן חלק מהרקע של ההתאבדויות הוא חומרני - סימן שיש לערים האלה מה להפסיד. חשוב שהם יראו שָאכן יש להם מה להפסיד. אין מה לעשות, הדמוקרטיה היחידה במזרח התיכון איננה יכולה להיאבק על קיומה נגד המפלצות האלה בדרכים דמוקרטיות.

איתן הבר:

איתן הבר היה יד ימינו של יצחק רבין בשני העשורים האחרונים ושירת כראש לישכתו. הוא עמד למראשותיו של רבין כשנפטר והוציא מכיסו את הפתק עם "שיר לשלום" מגואל בדם. הבר הוא עיתונאי בכיר ב"ידיעות אחרונות" ומחברם של מספר ספרים חשובים על מצבה של ישראל. כל העולם מחכה עכשיו לספר שיכתוב הבר על רבין. איתן הבר יהיה אורח אגודת הידידות של בית"ח "תל-השומר" בטורונטו, לארוחת ערב חגיגית ביום ה' 27 ביוני. זה בעוד חודשיים, אז רישמו ביומן. זו תהיה הזדמנות נדירה לכל הישראלים בטורונטו לשמוע ממקור הכי ראשון מה קרה, ומה יהיה.

JNF developing 'Rabin Park' near Jerusalem

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — In 1948, during Israel's War of Independence, Israeli troops broke through a powerful Arab defence line to relieve the siege of Jerusalem a few days before Passover; David Ben-Gurion celebrated the first seder there.

More than 100,000 Jews had been trapped in Jerusalem with no food or water, as troops slugged it out along what was known as the "Burma Road," Shaar Hagai, to capture the capital. One of the heroes of the breakthrough was a 26-year-old brigade commander of the Palmach, Yitzhak Rabin.

That victory, said Moshe Rivlin, world chair of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), marked a turning point and is one of the major chapters of Israel's history.

Now the road up to Jerusalem and the area surrounding it are being developed as Rabin Park, a memorial to the slain prime minister.

Rivlin, who was in Vancouver to speak at the JNF Pacific region annual Negev Dinner, said in an interview with The CJN and in his speech that trees burned during last July's devastating forest fire are being replanted and new varieties will be introduced. There will also be recreational space and playgrounds, and signs and pictures will tell the story of that phase of Israel's history. The rusty armored tanks which line the road will be retained.

More than 400 attended this year's Negev Dinner at the Four Seasons Hotel, held to promote support of the Keren Kayemeth LeYisrael (KKL) Park, which world Jewry, including Canada, will present to Jerusalem as a gift for Jerusalem 3000.

Rivlin said that although the JNF is mainly associated with planting trees, the organization "has everything to do with land development, not only by preparing the land for farming and housing but providing also the necessary water supply."

A project nearing completion is a series of canals and the Hula dam, near the Syrian border. The dam will catch the water from the canals to create a new lake, not far from Lake Kinneret. The new lake, besides being a source of water for settlers, will be stocked with fish and surrounded by playgrounds. He predicted it will become a great tourist attraction.

In another program started 2½ years ago, the JNF continues to "push back the desert in the Negev" and farms are producing citrus fruits, flowers, vegetables and other such products which they market through their cooperative, Agrexco, to Europe and the United States.

The necessary water supplies are being constructed and soon all sections of the newly-developed Negev will get its proper share of water, Rivlin said.

A seventh generation Israeli, Rivlin expressed pride in the rapid strides the country is making in population growth, agriculture and industry. He marvelled at the fact that the population comprises 82 cultures and backgrounds, including some "who jumped from the fourth century to the 20th century."

This dinner was short on speeches and long on entertainment, provided by Dudu Fisher, who provided a two-hour performance of cantorial, operatic and pop music.

Before dinner, Norman Gold and Gary Averbach, past presidents of the region, were presented with medals by the national JNF president, Sid Halpern of Winnipeg, for their dedication to the organization. Gold was awarded the President's Medal and Averbach received the Bernard M. Bloomfield Medal.

Ruth Freeman, regional chair, expressed pleasure that JNF support continues to be strong. She formally welcomed the new shaliach, Brig.-Gen. Yitzchak Fuchs.

Mayor Philip Owen of Vancouver brought greetings from the city, as well as from suburban municipalities whose mayors were in the audience.

Mel Kotler said the Hamotzi; Mel Sprackman was MC for the evening.

Gary Averbach (left) and Norman Gold, past presidents of the JNF Pacific region were presented with medals at the recent Negev Dinner in Vancouver.

YOUR ONTARIO GOVERNMENT

Doing Better for Less.

CHANGING GOVERNMENT FOR A BETTER ONTARIO

Doing better for less in government is a key part of our plan to reduce costs, balance our budget, improve the investment climate in Ontario, create jobs and restore hope and opportunity.

CHANGES TO IMPROVE THE SYSTEM

The government is spending $1 million an hour more than it is taking in. No family, business or government can survive spending like that. Spending $70 to administer each payment of $2.75 a day to jurors and sending OPP cars to Thunder Bay for basic repairs are the kinds of inefficiencies we must stop so we can direct your tax dollars into priority areas. And in priority areas such as health care, we're looking for efficiencies as well – taking the financial savings from expensive institutions to reinvest into critical areas such as long-term care community services, kidney dialysis, immunization, and cardiac services.

CHANGES THAT ARE THOROUGH AND FAIR

In November, we outlined cost-saving targets for ministries to achieve. We are meeting these targets and changing the way government operates by developing comprehensive business plans.

CHANGES THROUGH GOOD PLANNING AND MANAGEMENT

Ministry-by-ministry business plans are a new way to organize decisions about the "what, how, and where" of spending your tax dollars. By answering the tough question, "what is a ministry's core business?", we can focus our efforts like a laser beam. We will downsize operations, save money in administration, reduce waste and duplication, streamline and transfer services. Through this exercise, we will provide you better quality, lower cost core services and activities.

HOW YOU CAN BE INVOLVED

Detailed business plans will be published after the Budget. For a copy of the recent Legislative Statement on the Business Plan Project and information about how to send us your ideas call:

Bonds to honor Berkal as part of Jerusalem 3000

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In celebration of Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary, the State of Israel Bonds is honoring Rabbi Louis Berkal with a gala evening.

The popular longtime rabbi will be presented with the Fourth Millennium Award, as represented by a sculpture crafted by American artist Melanie Kline, created especially for the Israel Bonds Jerusalem 3000 campaign.

Up to 600 guests are expected to attend the May 2 tribute at the Winnipeg Convention Centre. Rabbi Berkal, 82, has served as assistant rabbi and cantor at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's largest congregation, since 1954. He began his rabbinic and cantorial career at the Beth Israel Synagogue in Grand Forks, N.D., in 1939.

Rabbi Berkal began his yeshivah studies in his native Lithuania and came to Winnipeg in 1927 where he continued his studies with Rabbi Israel Kahanovitch, then the chief rabbi of Winnipeg.

Rabbi Berkal was also a tenor soloist in the Talmud Torah choir which was lead by Cantor Benjamin Brownstone.

Noted for his calm and gentle manner, Rabbi Berkal has officiated at hundreds of bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings over the years and has spent a large amount of time visiting the sick.

The MC for the evening will be native son Allan Blye, who honed his own cantorial skills working with Rabbi Berkal at the Shaarey Zedek in days gone by. Based in Los Angeles, Blye was one of the founders of the Synagogue for the Performing Arts and served as its cantor for 14 years.

The evening's guest speaker will be Maj.-Gen. (Ret.) Nathan Sharony, presently the president and CEO of the State of Israel Bonds organization. Entertainment will be provided by Shalom Sherman, "the Jewish Cowboy of Encino," an Israeli-born singer, accordion player and comic, who sings classic western songs in Yiddish.

Windsor JNF Negev Dinner to honor Frances Parnes

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — The Windsor Jewish community will pay tribute to former Torontonian Frances Parnes at its annual Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner on June 11, at the Caboto Club, 2175 Parent Ave.

Born in Toronto to Isadore and Gertrude Gerstein, Parnes is a graduate of Harbord Collegiate and the Farband Jewish schools.

She moved to Windsor in 1951, following her marriage to Louis Parnes, and in 1970, she graduated from the Early Childhood Education (ECE) program at St. Clair College.

Parnes began her teaching career at the Louis and Rachel Kaplan Religious Nursery School, where she has introduced some 500 youngsters to formal Jewish education. She is also on staff at St. Clair College as a field supervisor, placing ECE students in nursery schools for their practice teaching. In addition, she received an award of merit from the Jewish Community Council (JCC) for her work as a volunteer instructor of Jewish children at Glenarda School.

Frances Parnes

Other volunteer activities have included work with Russian Jewish immigrants under a JCC outreach program, membership in Pioneer Women and Hadassah-WIZO, membership in Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue where she is a life member of the sisterhood, and work with the Windsor JNF.

This year marks the 25th anniversary of the JNF Negev Tribute Dinner in Windsor. The president of the Windsor JNF is Jerry Goldberg.

Keynote speaker will be Edward Greenspan, one of Canada's top criminal lawyers.

Proceeds from the dinner will go to the Gan Yaldei Yisrael, the garden of the children of Israel, in the Jerusalem Peace Forest.

Religious women serve Israel as volunteers

By GAIL LICHTMAN
World Zionist Press Service

They do not wear military uniforms or line up for the morning roll call, but 5,000 young religious women are serving their country through Israel's voluntary Sherut Leumi (National Service) program.

Established in 1972 by a small group of young women and with the blessing of then chief rabbi, the late Rabbi Shlomo Goren, Sherut Leumi enables observant women age 18 to 20 who are exempt from regular military service to contribute to Israeli society while preserving their religious lifestyle.

Mostly graduates of national religious stream schools, they work in institutions for the disabled, hospitals and schools; for the Magen David Adom; and with the elderly, new immigrants and youth.

"They bring tremendous light into the lives of those they help," says Shimon Nechama, director of the Boarding School Education and Special Function Division in the Ministry of Education. "These young women do three or four jobs and work all hours, with smiles on their faces."

They sign on for a period of one or two years with one of eight service organizations, which train and place the Sherut Leumi volunteers and receive a fee, set by an international committee, for each volunteer placed.

The volunteers must commit to work at least 40 hours a week for at least one year in the framework of their choosing. Those who do not live at home are provided with living quarters. All receive a modest allowance per month for living expenses and travel, although this is much less than the amount given to female soldiers.

They are not entitled to free bus travel, as are female soldiers, a matter presently before the Knesset for discussion. Since 1994, Sherut Leumi volunteers have been recognized by the Knesset as eligible for benefits such as study and housing grants given to demobilized soldiers.

The majority of Sherut Leumi volunteers serve in the education system. Some 2,400 are employed directly by the Ministry of Education while an additional 500 are employed through the schools themselves or through local municipalities.

"The Ministry of Education, as the largest employer of Sherut Leumi volunteers, is a focal point for service," says Nechama. "We employ volunteers in 1,000 educational facilities, mainly in special education and religious schools, but also in community centres and boarding schools, and in work with new immigrant children. Their contribution to the educational system is immeasurable."

Jerusalem's Amit Lieberman Mishpachton, a boarding school for boys aged 6 to 14 from distressed families, employs Sherut Leumi volunteers in the difficult, emotionally-draining work of living and working with boys with severe behavioral and emotional problems.

"We are not a regular boarding school," says director Beni Fischer. "We are organized along family lines. Ten to 12 boys live with a married couple who serve as their parents. Every family gets two Sherut Leumi volunteers to live with them, one of whom serves as coordinator.

"We see these young women as part of the team," Fischer adds. "They help the families in all matters and their work is as important as that of the parents. It would be very hard to manage without them."

Shacharit Or, 19, from Jerusalem and Galit Cohen, 19, from Beersheva are serving in Jerusalem's Ilanot School, a special educational facility for 50 children aged 6 to 20 with serious neuromuscular disabilities.

"I work in the classroom where I help organize things," says Or. "I also teach math on an individual basis. We have four children in the class, plus the teacher, an aide and me. Each child is a story in his or herself. They need a lot of attention and help."

Or has become very close with 12-year-old J. Confined in a wheelchair and unable to speak, J. has sparkling blue eyes and a mile-wide smile.

"J. is fantastic. He is very intellilgent and communicates using a board with symbols and letters. He always has something to say. I sit next to him during lessons so he can ask questions. But he is also very dependent and I have to feed him and give him to drink."

Cohen, who just started in the classroom, worked previously in Ilanot's afternoon centre with 13 children and teenagers with disabilities, who have been mainstreamed into regular schools.

"These kids come after school for physical therapy, occupational therapy and help with their studies. I formed very close friendship with two girls. Even though I've finished working there, I continue to keep in touch with them."

"Our six Sherut Leumi volunteers assist wherever help is needed," says Ilanot principal Pua Flaks. "Without them, Ilanot would not be able to function as it does. They do holy work."

Nechama is hopeful that in the near future Sherut Leumi volunteers will finally begin to receive the recognition they deserve. At a national conference held recently in Jerusalem honoring more than 2,000 volunteers, Minister of Education Amnon Rubinstein thanked them for their contribution to the educational system while Israel President Ezer Weizman praised them noting, "Sherut Leumi unites the people of Israel."

Survivor owes life to miraculous events in Soviet camps

be heard of again. We never heard of any executions; they simply disappeared. In the barracks, there were often rumors that the person was sent to another camp.

By nature, I was not a strong man. Furthermore, in my trade as a tailor, I had not developed any physical strength. My weight was always in the range of 50 to 55 kilograms and I always had the feeling that I would be next — any day or week, I would become the next candidate to disappear.

Transferred to mass production groups

One day they called us together because our production in the woodcutters' brigade was low. One of the leaders gave a patriotic speech, saying that our country, the Fatherland, needed wood and that we were like saboteurs because our productivity was only 20 or 30 percent of the norm. Suddenly, I pushed myself to the front of the crowd — there were about 300 to 400 people close to the platform — and screamed with all my power, in Russian:

"Deite nam bruky sheetch, we budiem Stachanutsky" — "Give us pants to make and we will be 'Stachanowze.' "

He looked at me angrily. Who was this person who did not agree with the leader? Speaking out like this was practically unheard of. I expected that they would ask my name and would "take care of" me, but nothing happened — or so it seemed.

I suspect, however, that the incident was reported to a higher authority who came to a different conclusion. A few days after my desperate outburst, an officer came around looking for tailors and shoemakers. Those who said they were one or the other were registered, but otherwise nothing changed.

One evening, however, some officials came to the barracks with lists of names. Those whose names were read were ordered to get their belongings and be ready to move to a special barracks. Of course, those of us on the list were overjoyed. Finally, we would be leaving the woods to do something we knew how to do ... to work in our trades.

The next day we boarded trucks and were taken from the camp. Where we were going, nobody told us. The trucks stopped near a big lake and loaded us into wooden barges, open boats that were usually used for freight. After crossing the lake, we were again taken on trucks. Finally, we arrived in a city near Finland at a camp set up with barracks for sleeping as well as barracks with sewing machines and tools for shoemakers.

We were all transferred to mass production groups. We made warm "ski jacket"-type coats called fufikes in Russian. We also made underwear, pants and other garments. The camp became famous for the quality and quantity of its production and we had huge orders. They told the foremen of a number of the groups that we had standing orders that would last us for years. As a result, we lived under improved conditions.

This situation lasted until the summer of 1941, when Nazi Germany started the war with Russia and advanced deep into the Soviet Union, encircling Leningrad, entering the Balkan countries and nearing Finland.

The Russians started evacuating the camps from that region and again we were loaded onto trucks and barges and placed in sealed cattle cars. Finally, after two months of travel, we arrived in the South Urals, at a place called Solikamsk (literally, "salt community").

When we arrived in September, we were officially informed that Polish citizens would be released from the camp. To my good fortune, I was among the first groups to be released. We received a paper document that said: "By the order of the Central Committee of the Soviet Union, the person ... (name filled in) was recognized as a citizen of the Polish Republic and that he (or she) was released and had the right to reside in the east and southeast of the Soviet Union except for cities in three categories ... (here it listed them).

I believe that because of my "scream of desperation," I may have saved, or at least eased, the lives of 400 to 500 Jews, including my own, who were transferred to the tailor and shoemaker factories from the hard labor camps. My memories give me this small sense of satisfaction.

Establishment of State of Israel ended helplessness of the Jews

Ezer Weizman

President Ezer Weizman's Independence Day Message to Communities Abroad

On the eve of the Sabbath, the 5th of Iyar, 5708, May 14, 1948, the State of Israel was declared and her Scroll of Independence was signed. In it, among other things, is stated: "The Holocaust which recently devastated the Jewish people and during which millions of Jews in Europe were massacred, once again clearly proved the necessity for independence and a homeland for the Jewish people by the establishment of its own country in Israel whose gates will be open to every Jew."

What followed is known. The idea of "helplessness" was wiped out forever from the thousand years of history of the Jewish people. Never again!

The State of Israel, which is celebrating its 48th anniversary, is a strong country with many wonderful achievements in almost all fields. Few countries in the world have accomplished so much in so short a period. The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) are the best in the world. They and our other security agencies give the state its strength, a major factor in convincing the wiser amongst our neighbors to cease their enmity and accept the road to peace.

But the road to true peace with all our enemies is still long and full of dangers. There are still extremist elements, eaten by deep-rooted hatred, who wish to kill Jews only by virtue of their being such. They choose not to remember the heavy price they paid 48 years ago. But it appears that no lesson was learned, perhaps because fanaticism, jealousy and hatred blind the senses.

However, now, during these very days, the murderers and their supporters, are being made aware that there is a limit to patience and that suffering will be their lot too. Those who reject our offer for peace will feel the long arm of IDF. Those who proudly boasted in Beirut and caused the inhabitants of Kiryat Shmona to enter shelters are now themselves seeking shelter. Those who still maintain that Jewish blood can be shed with impunity, forget that what was, will not be again, because the Jewish nation is a free one in its own homeland, a strong nation which defends itself.

And finally, I again turn to you, our brethren, in the Diaspora with a call from a warm and loving heart and from a country whose gates are open to you: "Rise up and come to Israel and the words of the prophet Isaiah will be fulfilled in you: And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Karnei Shomron Yeshiva students serve in the Israeli army

Our students at morning services

Yeshivat Hesder Karnei Shomron, established in 1980, today has 350 students.

These young men combine Jewish studies with military service for 5 years through the Hesder program (compared with the regular 3 years).

Karnei Shomron's students volunteer and serve in elite combat units; they put their lives on the line.

Eleven of them unfortunately paid the ultimate price with their lives.

Karnei Shomron's students take responsibility for defending the land of Israel and its People, but they cannot carry the entire burden alone:

THEY NEED YOUR HELP!

Author's novels evoke world of the ultra-Orthodox

By SHELLEY KLEIMAN
Special to The CJN

On the face of it there seems little in Naomi Ragen's life to suggest the ultra-Orthodox world she so successfully evokes in her three best-selling novels.

Her large suburban home in Ramot, a mixed religious and secular neighborhood in Jerusalem, seems more than a cultural stone's throw away from Mea Shearim and B'nei Brak where much of her fiction is set. But if it is esoteric to some, this world of matchmaking and wig choosing, of morals patrols and seminary study, is as familiar to Ragen as toast and jam.

Ragen's novels have sold more than half a million copies, and aside from the American and English editions, her first novel, Jephte's Daughter, was translated into Finnish; Sotah, her second into Norwegian. Sotah has just come out in Hebrew, leaving the American-born Ragen a little nervous about the exposure here.

Mother of four and grandmother of a 2-year-old, Ragen, 47, writes from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. "Those hours are sacrosanct," she says, then laughs: "Except when a kid gets sick and you have to run to the doctor."

Ragen is a woman with a mission. Blind conformity, the kind that feeds upon what the neighbors will say, the kind that suppresses individual freedom, is this novelist's muse.

Jephte's Daughter was based on a true story of an ultra-Orthodox woman who leapt to her death with her 3-year-old daughter. Physically and mentally abused by her husband and confined to a world in which "what's nice you don't show" or talk about, she took what she saw as her only way out. Shocked by the story (it turns out they had been neighbors) Ragen gives her fictional character a second chance.

"It would have served no purpose for her to have died in Jephte's Daughter, explains Ragen. "I wanted to bring her back to life, to show others like her what should have happened." In her own way, Ragen wants to make the world a better place.

A portrait of oppression and letter-of-the-law rigidity, Ragen's first novel left this devoutly religious writer feeling a bit guilty.

"There are many wonderful aspects of the haredi world — their family values, the way siblings care for each other, the way children respect their elders — that didn't surface in Jephte's Daughter," says Ragen.

She did not want the book to be translated into Hebrew and would not sell the film rights because she didn't want the image of a religious Jew beating his wife flashed on the screen. "I just couldn't do it."

Naomi Ragen

Ragen calls Sotah her tshuvah, or repentance, for her first novel. It is peopled with warm, supportive and kind people, but Jerusalem's ultra-Orthodox community is still not exactly paradise regained. About an ultra-Orthodox woman wrongly accused of adultery and banished from the community by a religiously ordained purge, Sotah is also about acceptance and forgiveness.

Ragen's third novel, The Sacrifice of Tamar — the story (also based on fact) of a haredi woman raped by a black man — takes place in a religious enclave in Brooklyn, where Ragen herself spent a year attending a women's teachers seminary.

Ragen likes to talk. Her speech is so fast that listening to her is like riding a New York City subway during rush hour — the words keep tumbling out, each pushing their way to exit first. She talks so intimately about her characters, it is a bit of a disappointment when they don't knock on the door to borrow some sugar or tea.

"They don't always cooperate," she says as if describing some recalcitrant children. "That's why I never know how my books will end until I get there."

Ragen's most deeply felt persona, though, is not a character, but a city, described in such intimate detail it is brought anthropomorphically alive.

"I'm so deeply in love with Jerusalem," says Ragen, echoing the sentiments of many of her characters.

"See the hills from my house?" asks Ragen. "Somewhere out there David fought Goliath. Over to the right is the tomb of Samuel the prophet."

To Ragen, Jerusalem is more than the concrete reality of cars, office buildings and hotels. "There is an otherworldliness here," she says. "What you are looking at is a palpable 2,000-year-old longing."

Born in 1949, Ragen grew up in the Rockaways, N.Y., in a racially-mixed low-income — "deadening to the imagination" — housing project. Her father died when she was five and an unredeemable $5 application fee landed her in a religious girls' school as a scholarship student. Ashamed of her financial status, she was even ashamed she didn't have a father.

"Isn't that strange?" Ragen asks, baffled by her own self-consciousness. It was in school that Ragen began her life-long love affair with Orthodox Judaism. And writing.

In 1971, Ragen and her husband moved to Israel without ever having been there: "We didn't want to be like the biblical spies."

She wrote freelance articles, suppressing, she says, an almost pathological fear of being considered a housewife who writes on the side.

By the time she decided to tackle fiction (she already had a BA and MA in English Literature), she and her husband traded in their brand of ultra-Orthodoxy for something more modern. Straddling two worlds, Ragen is as comfortable discussing D. H. Lawrence as she is explaining Jewish ritual.

Although she has read and admires Amos Oz and David Grossman — she finds the Hebrew a bit tough going despite her 25 years in the country — she admits to living in a sort of literary no-man's land.

"Israelis will never consider me truly their own," says Ragen, who writes in English, primarily for American audiences.

Ragen answers all her fan (and occasionally hate) mail and had not read reviews of her books since a New York Times reviewer hailed Jephte's Daughter as a new genre of Jewish Gothic. "As if I had made the whole thing up," fumes Ragen.

She is currently at work on her fourth novel. Taking her leave of the ultra-Orthodox world, she is approaching the Sephardi Jewish community with great awe. Three years into research, Ragen says she is only beginning to scratch the surface. Although the novel takes place in New York, Ragen feels confident her characters will end up in Jerusalem.

"It is," she says, "where all roads eventually lead."

Tourism high despite terrorism

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM – Despite four terrorist bombs that killed scores of people within 10 days in Israel recently, hotels throughout the country experienced a high rate of occupancy over the Passover holidays, according to representatives of Israel's Tourism Ministry.

Ministry officials acknowledge that there were numerous cancellations after the bombings – exactly how many is not yet clear. But they also assert that since many hotels had been heavily overbooked before the explosions, the actual number of visitors to Israel did not take a serious dip. All that happened, they contend, is that the overbooking situation was wiped out.

"We found that the bombings had a very minor effect on tourism," said Arie Sommer, director of overseas offices and operations for Israel's Tourism Ministry.

In a recent interview, Sommer asserted that would-be travellers are not staying away from Israel in droves, as they did during the intifada of the late 1980s and the Gulf War of 1991. Instead, he said, they continue to set new records. Two days before Passover, Israel's main international airport, Ben-Gurion Airport near Tel Aviv, experienced one of its busiest days ever when 230 flights carrying 40,000 travellers arrived and departed. To expedite the increased passenger volume, a second terminal was opened.

"If you look at London, Paris, Tokyo or Oklahoma – all these places suffered from terrorist attacks in the past year, yet the normal traffic of tourists has not been affected," Sommer said. "Tourists see these as isolated incidents and are not discouraged from travelling. I believe this is what is happening now with Israel. Despite the recent attacks, the image of peace that potential tourists associate with Israel is still much stronger in their minds."

Worth almost $3 billion (US) annually, tourism in Israel ranks, along with the export of diamonds and hi-tech products, as one of the nation's top three industries. And it is growing at a phenomenal pace. While world tourism industry grew an average of four percent in 1995, Israel experienced a 22 percent increase – more than five times the world average – in the same period.

In 1995, Israel received a record 2.5 million tourists, more than any other country in the Middle East. Egypt, which has terrorist problems of its own, drew only 1.5 million visitors last year. Jordan, which signed an accord with Israel in 1994, saw a subsequent dramatic rise in visitors – from about 240,000 in 1994 to 900,000 in 1995.

Sommer credits the peace process for much of Israel's tourism gains. "We're in a much better situation now than we were one year ago or two years ago or five years ago or 10 years ago. Now we can see the light at the end of the tunnel, whereas a few years ago we couldn't even see the tunnel. Yes, there are a few groups that are against the peace process. But these groups are not able to change the course of history."

Once isolated, Israel now enjoys open borders with Egypt and Jordan, as well as diplomatic relations with a growing list of Arab countries, including the Persian Gulf emirates of Oman and Qatar, which Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres visited earlier this month.

"Maybe one day we can become like Europe, where we don't have any borders and people can travel freely from country to country," said Sommer. "It's true, we still have some problems with Syria and other places, but these problems will be solved one day soon."

Sommer is still amazed at the speed with which Israel and Jordan normalized relations. "I was part of the team that negotiated on tourism matters with Jordan. For me, it was like a dream. No one could believe it could happen so soon. I remember patrolling the Jordanian border as a soldier. Suddenly I was crossing to Jordan in an official car and the Jordanian soldiers were saluting us. I'll never forget it."

Like many ministry officials, Sommer asserts that the tourism industry is important not just for the dollars it brings into Israel, but because it brings prosperity to the region, and thus strengthens the peace process. "I think that tourism is really the right vehicle in promoting good relations between countries," he said.

Israel, Jordan and Egypt have already begun work on a "Red Sea Riviera" featuring hotels, cafes, various tourist attractions, and a pedestrian promenade and bicycle path running from the Egyptian resort of Taba through Eilat to the Jordanian port city of Aqaba. As well, Israel and Jordan are planning several joint tourism projects.

These include a shared airport for Eilat and Aqaba, a tourism school on the border, a Coral Reef Park for divers in the Gulf of Eilat, a nature reserve around the Dead Sea called the Lowest Point on Earth Park, and a Spice Trail Park in the Negev along the route of ancient Nabatean spice merchants.

According to Sommer, the ministry is keenly interested in promoting the entire region, not just Israel, even though tourists may spend less time in Israel as a result. "We do it intentionally and with open eyes,"he said. "We know that we'll lose some tourist-nights. But we also know that we'll be compensated by a larger number of tourists who will come to the area because of the peace process."

The tourism ministry has been continuously upgrading and improving tourist facilities around the country. It has also been developing recently-uncovered historic sites, such as Beit Shean, an ancient Roman-Byzantine village under excavation and reconstruction south of Lake Kinneret, and Beit Guvrin, an ancient village with thousands of caves about an hour south of Jerusalem. Since 40 percent of all travellers to Israel have been there before, ministry officials are keen to ensure that there is always something new for repeat visitors to see.

In recent years, Israeli tourism officials have been astonished to see growing numbers of visitors from Far Eastern countries such as Malaysia, Indonesia, Korea and Japan, as well as from republics of the former Soviet Union.

"The traffic from Russia to Israel is unbelievable," said Sommer. "We have 150,000 Russians coming here every year, and we don't invest a penny in marketing. It's an excellent market for us. They have a lot of money. They come, they pay cash, they love the country, and they travel all over from Eilat to the Galilee. For us, it's one of those phenomena that are difficult to explain."

According to Sommer and others in the ministry, the most skittish travellers to Israel – the ones who are first to cancel at the slightest sign of trouble – are the Jews of North America. "The Christians that come to Israel often plan their trips years in advance," he said. "For them, it's a once-in-a-lifetime vacation. They are coming in a group and it's very difficult for them to change their plans if there is instability in the region.

"On the other hand, most of the Canadian and American Jews who come here are familiar with the destination. It's not a once-in-a-lifetime vacation for them, and it isn't a problem if they postpone a visit for a few weeks or months. And since they don't plan years ahead, it's easier for them to postpone."

Roughly one-third of the 52,000 Canadians who visited Israel last year were Jewish, ministry figures show. Yet only about 20 percent of Canada's approximately 350,000 Jews have visited Israel to date. Naturally, Israel's tourism ministry would like to increase this percentage.

"Our problem is not the affiliated Jews who read the paper and go to shul, because we're able to convey our message to them," said Sommer. "The problem is the unaffiliated Jews. What we're planning to do in coming months is to target areas that are known as heavily populated with Jewish people. We'll advertise on local TV stations and in newspapers in these Jewish areas. Otherwise, it's difficult to reach these people."

As of last year, Air Canada began to offer regularly-scheduled direct flights from Canada to Israel to compete with El Al's previous monopoly on direct flights between the two countries. As well, numerous tour operators in Canada, including Sunquest and Regent, have begun to offer a variety of competitive packages to Israel and the region in the last few years. According to statistics kept by the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, nearly 30 percent more Canadians visited Israel in 1995 than in 1994.

"Until a few years ago there was a kind of stagnation in the market in Canada," said Sommer. "Now things have changed. We really believe that Canada has high potential for us. We have high hopes."

Yiddish is more than a language

By CHAYA EREZ
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Now that winter is almost over and thoughts are turning to spring and next year's course selection, please allow the confessions of this Yiddish "activist" to influence your next year's course selection.

My initial venture into Yiddish was to exchange a few words with my parents. (The nachas (joy) of older people hearing younger people speak their mame loshen (mother tongue) should not be taken lightly!) But the realization that Yiddish is more than merely a language, that it is part of the complex mosaic of Jewish heritage, came to me gradually.

From a purely sociolinguistic perspective, Yiddish is rich because it captures the experiences of a people who incorporated their religion, customs and day-to-day living into their language, often in hostile surroundings. Their language was their means of expressing joy and sorrow.

Studying Jewish history, and particularly Holocaust history, made me realize that the Nazis, in their attempt to annihilate the Jews, had also attempted to snuff out Jewish culture, including this vibrant language of Eastern Europe. The Soviets also did their best to stifle Yiddish.

I therefore feel a personal need to become acquainted with the works of those whose voices were too often silenced. I feel the responsibility to keep the language alive, to ensure the links in the chain of Jewish continuity are not broken. Learning Yiddish today is a political act against the anti-Semitism of the past.

I have added my voice to Jewish continuity by incorporating Yiddish as much as possible into my academic and daily life, by studying those aspects of Jewish history related to Yiddish, by striving to read Yiddish sources in the original, by actively joining in Yiddish speaking activities, by travelling to Israel to study Yiddish at an Israeli university.

But one doesn't need to travel so far, for right here at the University of Toronto there is an excellent Yiddish program. At present, the program consists of three levels of language and literature, as well as a course in Yiddish literature in English translation.

I have taken all four courses and have loved each of them. The teaching staff is wonderful, maintaining high standards of teaching while communicating their love of the language, its literature and its culture. It is very difficult for class members not to be affected by these teachers' enthusiasm for Yiddish and they have been an inspiration to many of their students. The classes are not large, allowing for a great deal of interaction.

You may be saying to yourself: Fine, but where will Yiddish take me academically? My answer is — wherever you want. For example, I would like to do historical research through the local Yiddish newspapers. Yiddish is also one key to serious research into Eastern European Jewish history. Or one might explore the place of Yiddish in modern-day Israel or the struggle between Yiddish and Hebrew as the national language of East European Jews. A comparison of Yiddish and its Sepharadi counterpart, Ladino, might prove interesting — and the list of possibilities goes on and on.

Through my new-found interest in Yiddish, I have met many interesting people from different backgrounds, ranging from a Japanese professor of Yiddish to the descendents of Baron Hirsh's agricultural ventures in South America to Yemenite Yiddish teachers, not to mention a number of inter-generational Torontonians, all with their own unique reasons for studying Yiddish.

I hope my enthusiasm for Yiddish has stimulated your interest and, if I haven't yet convinced you to register, that you will at least think about it.

Chaya Erez is a student at the University of Toronto.

Peres, Arafat meet as Lebanon conflict continues

By NAOMI SEGAL and JON IMMANUEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency and Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Shimon Peres and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat agreed last week to continue the contacts needed to coordinate the Israeli redeployment in Hebron and easing of the closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Their meeting last Thursday at the Erez Crossing on the Gaza-Israeli border was the first since the string of suicide attacks in Israel between Feb. 25 and March 4 that claimed 59 victims.

The two-hour meeting initiated by Peres was especially signficant, because it occurred on one of the bloodiest days of Operation Grapes of Wrath, which Arafat has condemned. He said Israel should return to the 1993 ceasefire. "A month of dialogue is better than an hour of war," he said.

After the suicide bombings by Islamic militants, Israel postponed its planned redeployment from most of Hebron and suspended further implementation of the Interim Agreement with the Palestinians.

Israel demanded that the Palestinian Authority take decisive steps to capture the leaders of the militant Hamas and Islamic Jihad fundamentalist groups.

Shimon Peres

Israeli sources were quoted earlier as saying that Israel had initially set the capture of the head of the Hamas military wing, Mohammad Deif, as a precondition to resuming implementation of the Israeli-Palestinian accords. But that demand was withdrawn in light of what were described as the "serious" efforts by the Palestinian security forces to crack down on militants, the sources said.

Top Palestinian and Israeli security officials took part in the meeting, including Ami Ayalon, the head of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security service, and Mohammad Dahlan, his Palestinian counterpart.

They discussed issues such as Hamas, the covenant and Hebron, which must all be resolved before final status talks start. Peres said the Palestinian security officials briefed the Israelis on their crackdown on Hamas, which has included arrests of some 900 suspected activists since the bombings. According to local reports, some of the detainees have already been released.

Arafat charged that Iran is trying to unite Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Lebanon-based Islamic militant movement Hezbollah against the peace process and the Palestinian self-rule government in particular. But he said he would not allow such activities to happen in the autonomous areas.

Arafat also confirmed that the Palestine National Council would convene Monday to discuss a number of issues, including revoking the anti-Israel clauses in its charter.

Asked whether he believed that the clauses would be dropped, Arafat said, "We are committed to what has been agreed upon and what has been signed." But, he added "I cannot guarantee the change in the covenant, and you have to respect our democracy."

Refugee shelling a key turning point

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – More than 12,000 artillery shells were fired with surgical precision into Lebanon in the eight days of Operation Grapes of Wrath. The IDF had boasted of the accuracy of its hits and showed off its sophisticated weaponry, which was supposed to avoid civilian casualties.

Commentary

But it took just five deadly rounds from a 155-mm howitzer to bring the meticulously planned operation crashing down. The shelling of innocent refugees will go down in history as the turning point in Israel's latest foray into Lebanon.

The Israeli government will most likely call off the bombardment before any sort of truce is reached and opt for negotiating a diplomatic arrangement as soon as possible. But the result will be less favorable than one reached before the world witnessed the deaths of possibly 100 civilians.

"It is a public relations disaster and it will be the end of Operation Grapes of Wrath," said Reuven Pedatzur, director of the Galilee Centre for Strategic and National Security. "The option is to stop firing and to start talking. Certainly, any inevitable agreement will be far worse than it would have been."

Prime Minister Shimon Peres is under international pressure to stop the assault against Hezbollah. But with elections less than six weeks away, he faces an equally agitated domestic front which wants Israel to come out of the operation with an agreement better than the unwritten understandings of Operation Accountability in 1993.

"He can't finish the operation without showing an achievement," said Shmuel Sandler, a senior research associate at Bar-Ilan University's BESA Centre for Strategic Studies. He added that the IDF would now be much more careful in its war on Hezbollah.

"This was a domestically oriented operation, and I am sure that what interests Peres now is the election. The longer the army is involved, the greater the chances of more blood being shed. Peres is highly concerned with Israeli casualties, so undoubtedly he will hasten his attempt to finish this war," Sandler said.

Elections notwithstanding, Pedatzur said he believes Peres is hypersensitive to world opinion and likely to grab at any agreement he could arrange.

Lebanon deal sought

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Lebanon teeters between war and conflict resolution.

There was no end in sight to the fighting there this week, as the United States, France, the European Union and Russia launched separate but overlapping efforts to defuse the cross-border battles pitting Israel against Hezbollah.

Mideast Analysis

Israel, Lebanon, Syria, Hezbollah and Iran were the focus of the diplomacy. The challenge is not only to pacify Lebanon, which is just emerging from a debilitating 15-year civil war, but to set the stage for a lasting accommodation between Israel and Syria over the Golan Heights.

The immediate objective of the United States — the only outside power capable of defusing the crisis — is to stop the violence with a ceasefire so that civilians in the Galilee and in southern Lebanon are no longer at risk. Fifty Israelis have been wounded and about 150 Lebanese have been killed in the crossfire so far. Washington requested an immediate truce when Israel accidentally shelled a United Nations camp near Tyre, killing 75 Lebanese refugees who had taken shelter there.

Over the longer term, the goals of the United States are far more ambitious: to end the fighting once and for all, to disarm Hezbollah and to facilitate an Israeli withdrawal from its self-declared security zone in southern Lebanon. But for the plan to work effectively, it must be acceptable, not only to Lebanon, a helpless bystander, but also to Syria, the chief arbiter in Lebanon, and Iran, Hezbollah's chief backer and a vehement opponent of the Oslo peace process.

Israel, which launched its air, land and naval blitz to silence Hezbollah's rain of Katyushas, is demanding a written rather than an oral agreement to call off its offensive. This would replace an informal understanding arranged by the United States in July 1993, following a one-week Israeli bombardment of southern Lebanon known as Operation Accountability.

This accord collapsed after Hezbollah rocketed Kiryat Shmona and other settlements in northern Israel and killed seven Israeli soldiers serving in the security buffer established by Israel in 1985. The United States now believes that Iran, hoping to ruin the Labor party's chances of winning the May 29 general election in Israel, goaded Hezbollah to violate the 1993 accord. But Syria is also at fault, having used Hezbollah as a surrogate to pressure Israel for better terms on a bilateral peace settlement.

In the meantime, Operation Grapes of Wrath has turned into Israel's longest offensive in Lebanon since 1982. Israel has shelled, bombed and strafed suspected Hezbollah positions, Lebanese power plants and Lebanon's north-south coastal road. Israel also targeted the home of Monir Makdah in Ain el-Hilweh, the largest Palestinian refugee camp in Lebanon. Makdah, the leader of the rejectionist Black September organization, broke ranks with PLO chairman Yasser Arafat after his rapprochement with Israel in 1993.

Israel's onslaught has not silenced Hezbollah, which has fired more than 500 Katyusha salvos into the Galilee, calling into question the effectiveness of Operation Grapes of Wrath.

Approximately 1,000 buildings, including an empty kindergarten and a chicken coop filled with thousands of chickens, have been damaged by Hezbollah's rockets, usually fired from civilian areas north of the security zone.

It seems clear that Israel, which has prosecuted the operation without ground troops, cannot root out Hezbollah by military means alone. Israel could escalate the conflict by pushing the security zone northward and thus keeping the Galilee out of Katyusha range. But Prime Minister Shimon Peres is loathe to widen the war, incur casualties and thereby diminish his re-election prospects.

Certainly, Israel's offensive is bound to trigger a sharp response from Hezbollah's Islamic fundamentalist allies. Last week's terrorist attack on a group of Greek tourists in Cairo, perpetrated by the Islamic Group which is fighting to overthrow the secular Egyptian government, was meant for Israeli tourists staying in the same hotel. It may have been a foretaste of things to come.

The Week in Israel

April 15

• Ha'aretz reported that the consumer price index rose by one percent in March compared to a rise of .09 percent during both January and February.

• Ha'aretz reported that U.S. Gen. Malcolm O'Neill, head of the Pentagon's missile defence department will arrive soon in Israel to finalize details of the agreement with Israel for the joint development of technology against surface-to-surface missiles. The agreement will ensure continued development of Israel's anti-missile defence system based on the Arrow missile.

April 16

• According to a poll released by the Tami Steinmetz Centre for Peace at Tel Aviv University, public confidence in the peace process has returned to the level it enjoyed among the general population before the spate of terror attacks in February and March. The survey was conducted on March 27.

April 17

• The trial of Yigal and Haggai Amir and Dror Adani opened in Tel Aviv District Court before a panel of judges headed by Judge Amnon Strauschnov. The defendants are charged with conspiracy to commit murder, conspiracy to commit criminal acts, and illegal production and possession of weapons. At the outset of the trial, Yigal Amir disclosed that he was on a hunger strike to protest against what he described as terrible conditions at Ohalei Kedar Prison in Beersheba.

Support still widespread for Lebanon operation withdraw from Lebanon while ensuring quiet in northern Israel. I don't think Bibi has any interest in withdrawing from Lebanon or reaching an agreement with Syria," she says.

It is not only the left that has endorsed Peres' stand. Likud leader Netanyahu pledged his support for the military operation and urged the prime minister "not to crack" under international pressure. Nearly 60 percent of Likud voters (and 82 percent of the general public) approve of Peres' handling of the Lebanon crisis, according to a Gallup poll commissioned by the Hebrew daily Ma'ariv before the shelling incident in Cana.

But Peres' new tough guy image has not improved his electoral prospects, according to the latest polls. One showed that Peres had dropped a percentage point since the start of the operation. Pollsters attribute this to a loss of support among Israeli Arabs, who are livid about the Lebanon crisis and have even boycotted meetings with Peres to show their disapproval.

Among Israeli Jews, there are also cracks in support. Meretz MK Dedi Zucker revealed on Sunday that Meretz ministers had opposed the military operation, but were outvoted at a cabinet meeting. Zucker noted that many Meretz voters believe the operation should continue.

"But I think we must look farther than the tip of our noses and admit that our expectations in Lebanon are unrealistic," he said. "The northern settlements are in a much worse situation today than they were before we started this operation."

Gen. (Res.) Amram Mitzneh, former head of Central Command and now mayor of Haifa, called the shelling of Kana "a big mistake" that cannot be dismissed as "one of those things that happen in war. The end doesn't always justify the means," he insisted.

Many analysts fear the international community will now impose a cease fire and pressure Israel into an unfavorable agreement. Some note the fact that after 10 days of pounding southern Lebanon, Israel has still not been able to stop the daily barrage of Katyushas – a fact that can only hurt the IDF's image and deterrent power. Others believe the Israeli initiative has only reinforced Syria's central position in the region.

Most Israelis are withholding final judgment until they see the results of Operation Grapes of Wrath. Will it bring long-sought tranquility to Israel's northern communities? Will Lebanon disarm the Hezbollah? And how long will the parties adhere to any agreement?

If last Thursday's tragic shelling has reminded Israelis of one thing, it is that Lebanon is a land of illusions. It promises easy solutions, but it is fraught with traps that even a left-wing leader and reputed peacemaker like Peres cannot avoid.

The Hezbollah's use of civilians as human shields is one of those traps. Now Israelis are just hoping that the operation that began as Grapes of Wrath doesn't end up as sour grapes.

Terrorists threaten Arad

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Senior Israeli security officials said this week that Iran was responsible for the safety of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad.

The statements came after an Islamic terrorist group threatened to kill Arad if Israel did not stop its bombing campaign in Lebanon.

A telephone caller claimed last Friday that the Organization for the Oppressed of the Earth would kill Arad in 48 hours to avenge the Israeli shelling a day earlier of a UN base in southern Lebanon that resulted in the deaths of at least 75 Lebanese refugees.

The caller also said the group would film and distribute Arad's execution – as it did when it kidnapped and executed U.S. Marine Lt.-Col. William Higgins in 1989, saying that he was spying for Israel.

Arad's fighter plane was shot down over Lebanon in 1986. Israel officials have repeatedly maintained that Iran is holding him.

In response to the report, Israeli Deputy Defence Minister Ori Orr called the Oppressed of the Earth "a cover for Hezbollah."

He also said, "This could be psychological warfare."

Orr added that "this is the first announcement in a long time" that any group admitted to holding Arad.

Western intelligence officials have reportedly linked the Organization for the Oppressed of the Earth to Hezbollah, saying that it is one of several militant groups that follow Hezbollah's orders.

Israeli security sources said they were investigating the caller's claim.

American officials said Saturday that the call was a hoax. But the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv issued an advisory to American citizens traveling in Israel to exercise caution.

The advisory did not suggest that Americans should cancel their visits to Israel.

Changing its Charter not Palestine Council priority

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – The Palestine National Council (PNC) was scheduled to convene in Gaza this week, but changing its charter did not appear to be among its priorities.

"In the council's meeting, which won't last less than five days, the annulment or change of the covenant will not be discussed," Salim Zanoun, acting PNC chair, was quoted in the Al Quds newspaper.

Under the Israel-Palestinian accords, the PNC must revoke the anti-Israel clauses in its charter. It is not clear whether this would be accomplished by amending the existing charter or drawing up a new one.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has assured Israel that the PNC would fulfil the commitment to change the charter and that such action would be taken when the Palestinian parliament in exile meets this week for the first time in the self-rule areas.

The recent events in Lebanon, particularly Israel's shelling last week of a UN post, have made the atmosphere for changing the covenant combative.

Opponents of changing the covenant said, "The slaughter in Lebanon obliges those who accepted Arafat's position on change to backtrack."

Among the PNC members are representatives of Palestinian organizations that are opposed to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

"Isn't it funny. If Lebanese civilians are evacuated from their homes, they're 'refugees'. But Israelis are called 'guests'."
- Israeli teenager after listening to a newscast.

No, it's not funny. A state of emergency exists in northern Israel due to the relentless bombardment by Hezbollah rockets. Evacuees without families in safe areas continue to become the 'guests' of Na'amat - in their private homes, as well as in child care and other Na'amat facilities.

This has put a further burden on our already overstrained budget. We need financial support to maintain normalcy and meet the physical and emotional needs of families being kept out of harm's way. Please help.

Anti-Semitism a key component of Freemen leader's beliefs

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON – Shortly before their standoff with federal authorities began, Leroy Schweitzer gave his fellow Freemen a pep talk.

"It's a race war," Schweitzer, a Freemen leader, said of the anti-government group's struggle against society. "It's a spiritual war between Satan's seed, Satan's children, the Jews and God's children.

"God tells his people to kill many, many times in Scripture. He doesn't allow murder, but he allows killing. Jews brought the blacks into this country to destroy us and they knew that it would eventually, and it has to this point almost destroyed us."

Morris Dees, a civil rights attorney and founder of the Southern Poverty Law Centre, quoted from Schweitzer's invective at a National Press Club briefing this week. He said the centre obtained a recording of conversations among the Freemen.

The group, which is holed up on a farm in Jordan, Mont., and which is under FBI surveillance, rejects the authority of the federal and state governments. Several members of the group have been charged with defrauding banks, businesses and public agencies of $1.8 million, threatening a federal judge and stealing television equipment.

They do not, however, view themselves as criminals, but as agents of God engaged in battle against a satanic government, according to experts.

The delusional ideas of the Freemen and similar extremist groups are not new, experts say; many are rooted in white supremacist doctrines such as those of the Christian Identity movement, which subscribes to racism, anti-Semitism and male supremacy.

"These people believe that Aryans are the true children of God, the true Israelites," Dees said. "They believe that Jews are the children literally of the devil, and that blacks are beasts of the fields."

Brian Schnitzer, president of the Montana Association of Jewish Communities, said that even though he believes that the Freemen and other Christian Identity groups would "annihilate all Jews and people of color if they had their way," they have never specifically threatened or targeted Jews in the area.

Before the standoff began, Schnitzer said, there had even been a "certain amount of sympathy" for groups such as the Freemen from others who despise taxes and fear government intrusiveness.

"But their support seems to kind of drift away when their bizarre philosophies become known," said Schnitzer, who lives in Billings.

Given their fierce hatred of government and a theology that foretells a final battle between forces of light and darkness, some experts see little promise for a peaceful resolution to the standoff.

The Freemen and other such groups will not talk to the FBI, Dees said, "because they see the FBI as agents of ZOG – the Zionist Occupied Government. And they believe that this national worldwide and Jewish conspiracy is out to destroy Aryan people."

For the Freemen, said Dees, it is a "holy war."

Slain tourists mistaken for Israelis

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – An Israeli group was the intended target of a terrorist attack that left 18 Greek tourists dead in Cairo last week.

In a statement sent to a news agency, Egypt's largest Islamic militant group claimed responsibility for the deadly April 18 shooting attack outside Cairo's Europa Hotel.

The statement said the Islamic group had received information that Israeli tourists staying in the hotel were about to board a bus and "was surprised when, after the act was carried out, it was discovered that the Israeli group had been switched with another one."

The organization called it "another step taken by the Egyptian security forces to protect Israelis."

Egyptian police have arrested a number of suspects in connection with the attack.

Meanwhile, another Islamic militant group, the Vanguards of Conquest, urged Muslims around the world to target American and Israeli interests to avenge Israel's ongoing campaign against Hezbollah targets in Lebanon.

It blamed the Israeli campaign on an anti-terror summit held last month in Egypt and on the peace deals that Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinians have signed with Israel.

Police increase security as Netanyahu gets death threats

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu has received dozens of death threats in recent weeks, leading the General Security Service (GSS) and police to increase their protection of him.

During the recent Mimouna celebrations, GSS agents had to convince Netanyahu to wear a bulletproof vest.

The threats first came in on the Telemesser call-in phone numbers the Likud had made public. Among the messages recorded were a number which said "Bibi, we will kill you," and "Bibi, you will never live to become prime minister," and "Netanyahu will die."

What made the GSS even more concerned, however, was that the phoned-in threats were later backed up with similar written threats.

Netanyahu told Likud activists last Thursday "not to yield to provocation and not to allow yourselves to be goaded into any conflict or any violence. All Likud activists must behave only according to the campaign team's instructions and must take no initiatives."

He was speaking at a meeting of the Likud campaign steering committee.

Sonar photos fail to find lost sub

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Sonar photographs believed to be that of a long-missing submarine are nothing more than shadows of large rocks, Israel's navy commander said this week.

Last week, the navy carried out searches off the coast of the Sinai Peninsula, the area where the photos were taken, after relatives of the submarine's crew asked the navy to verify a claim made by a private company that it had found the sub.

The Dakar submarine disappeared 18 years ago with 69 crew members on board as it was travelling from Great Britain to Israel.

The navy has since carried out periodic, but fruitless, searches for the Dakar.

Earlier this month, a private company, Oceania, disclosed sonar photos of what it claimed was the sub.

The company, as well as the Israeli navy, were first pointed to a site off the coast of the Egyptian city of Port Said by a Haifa fisherman, who said that his net got caught on a metal object while fishing in the area eight years ago.

Officials at Oceania would neither confirm nor reject the navy's conclusions about the photographs.

Israel PM's job 'a staggering burden': Kollek

By TEDDY KOLLEK and AMOS KOLLEK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Political life in Israel is not easy. Many people have commented on the bitter manner in which some of Israel's top leaders – David Ben-Gurion, Menachem Begin, Golda Meir and Moshe Dayan, to name a few – have ended their careers and their lives. The demands placed on our leaders are tremendous, but the appreciation and respect they receive is often quite limited.

Opinion

One sometimes wonders where they find the fortitude and the will to continue, and how much better off we would all be, if support from the media and the public for the government they have elected was more forthcoming.

We are particularly reminded of this issue these days when we watch Prime Minister Shimon Peres going about his work.

Peres has had a long and illustrious career. He has served in public life longer than any other Israeli leader living today, has held almost every important position imaginable, maybe most notably being involved for decades in the building of Israel's defence industry, and has been at the centre of Israeli political decision making from the very start.

It has been a bittersweet career. The most rewarding part of it seemed to have come in 1992 and 1993 when, together with Yitzhak Rabin, Peres led groundbreaking moves toward a comprehensive peace and seemed to have gained not only the Nobel Prize, but for the first time, the nearly unanimous approval and respect of his own people.

When Rabin was assassinated, Peres found himself in an almost impossible position. The staggering burden formerly shared by two tremendously capable leaders was now to be borne by Peres alone.

These days, the work and the pressures brought to bear on him are literally never-ending. And there is the added factor of physical danger.

Until Rabin's assassination, the job of prime minister had not seriously been considered as possibly life-threatening.

Now it is, very much so. Peres must deal, on a daily basis, not only with a huge mountain of work, much of which involves some very tough decisions, but also with the threat of constant danger to his life.

Under these circumstances he has been functioning amazingly well, displaying courage, determination and calm that deserves the highest respect. And praise. Praise that should be not only felt but acknowledged and voiced, even by those who do not agree with everything he stands for.

Peres continues to be willing to go anywhere and meet anyone, despite heavy restrictions imposed on him by the security services. Since assuming the premiership, he has accomplished great things.

We don't know of any other prime minister in Israel's history who could have put together, on such short notice, such an impressive list of world leaders as the one that convened to fight terrorism and show solidarity with Israel.

The conference was an amazing accomplishment, one that undoubtedly will have long-range results that will benefit us greatly. Those who say that the convention was just a lot of empty talk only show their own lack of foresight.

Gaining international understanding and support for Israel's position and activities against terrorism, some of which we are witnessing these days in Lebanon, is by itself of tremendous significance.

It enables us to act firmly, efficiently and on a great scale, with the backing of the international community. And this is only one of many results yet to come.

Peres has also managed, in a very short time, to gather round him an excellent team, headed by Ehud Barak and Haim Ramon, relatively young men, full of energy and promise, who have already proven themselves in public life and enjoy well-deserved respect from the general public.

If we compare them to the Likud's top team, we find Benjamin Netanyahu surrounded by Ariel Sharon, David Levy and Rafael Eitan – older, much more controversial and much less confidence-inspiring, to put it mildly.

Explosion rips Russian JCC

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW – An explosion ripped through a Jewish community centre in the Russian city of Yaroslavl, causing no injuries but seriously damaging the two-storey building housing the centre in the city's historic quarter.

The bomb used in last Friday's attack contained a charge equivalent to more than two pounds of TNT, a spokesperson for regional police said.

No one claimed responsibility for the attack.

Some in the Jewish community believe that the perpetrators will never be apprehended.

"I think no one will be arrested and punished," said Inna Davidova, director of the Hesed Charitable Society and member of the community's executive board.

She said she saw no reason for anyone to attack the community, adding, "We have always had a good relationship with the authorities and with the general community"

The community centre is located in a synagogue that was erected in 1916. In 1934, the building was confiscated by local Communist authorities. The Jewish community recovered the property in 1994.

Along with a synagogue, the centre houses local organizations that serve the needs of the 2,500-member Jewish community in Yaroslavl, about 130 miles northeast of Moscow.

The explosion, caused by a bomb planted outside the centre, shattered all the windows in the building and in some neighboring houses.

An office of the Hesed society and a room that served as the community library suffered the worst damage.

The attack came a day after the Israeli army shelled a UN base in southern Lebanon, killing refugees who had taken shelter there.

Some Russian media reports suggested another connection,noting a possible link between the bombing of the centre and the birthday of Adolf Hitler, which falls on April 20 and which is sometimes marked by Russian neo-Nazis with acts of violence.

Citing another possible connection, the Russian daily Moskovsky Komsomolets noted that several members of a neo-Nazi group known as the Werewolf Legion were recently sentenced to jail terms by a regional court in Yaroslavl.

The paper suggested the explosion may have been carried out by supporters of the jailed neo-Nazis.

Scud attacks form backdrop to two Israeli films

In this, the first of two successive articles, Sheldon Kirshner previews some of the movies to be shown at the fourth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival between May 2 to 9.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

You'd expect a measure of tension in an Israeli film about the 1991 Gulf War. Yet in David Ofek's 18-minute quasi-documentary, Home (May 2), the war is almost an afterthought.

Home revolves around an Iraqi Jewish family in Ramat Gan waiting for Scud missiles to fall on their neighborhood. Baghdad already has been bombed, and Israelis are expecting Iraq to make good on its promise to bombard Israel with Scuds.

As they watch CNN's wall-to-wall coverage of the war, wearing their obligatory gas masks, two members of the family born in Baghdad wax nostalgic about their birthplace.

Home — a cameo of the 1991 conflict — takes a quirky turn when grandma grumbles about her grandson's girlfriend, prompting him to stiffen his resolve about their mutual future.

Song of the Siren (May 2) also unfolds against the backdrop of the Gulf War, and like Home, glides blithely over it.

Talila Katz is a rising star at a Tel Aviv advertising agency, but her personal life is in a shambles. Ofer, her co-worker and fiance, abruptly leaves her for another woman, and she is devastated. Talila bounces back and entices Noah, a down-to-earth engineer, into her clutches.

As the romance blooms, people in Tel Aviv talk about and prepare for war. At the ad agency, employees nonchalantly debate whether a Scud will hit Tel Aviv today. In a reprise of an actual phenomenon, some Tel Avivians hit the road for Jerusalem, which remains untouched by the Iraqi missile barrage.

Talila seems oblivious to it all. She is fixated with Noah and with her sister-in-law's crumbling marriage. The plot thickens as Noah's former flame returns from Boston and as Ofer has second thoughts about Talila.

Song of the Siren, directed by Eytan Fox, has the feel and the look of a mid-1990s daytime soap opera. The characters are hip and hedonistic and the sets and wardrobe are cool and fashionable. Dalit Kahan, in the role of Talila, puts on a convincing performance.

Delicately drawn canvas

Round Eyes in the Middle Kingdom (May 6) is a documentary which relates the story of a Polish Jew, Israel Epstein, who made his home in China. The film is by Ronald Levaco, who was born in Tianjin in 1940 and whose father, a business representative from Poland, befriended Epstein.

Like nearly all foreigners, the Levacos left China in 1949 when the Communists took over. Epstein and a coterie of Westerners remained behind, adopting Chinese citizenship, marrying local women, joining the Communist party and suffering through political upheavals such as the Cultural Revolution.

A film of limpid beauty, Round Eyes in the Middle Kingdom is more than just a portrait of Epstein and his fellow expatriate, the American Sidney Rittenberg. Much like an ethereal Chinese print, it is a delicately drawn canvas of a tumultuous period in a country's history and of the conflicting values held by Westeners who lived there.

Jessica Shamash's My Auntie Told Me (May 6), a 14-minute short, is a rumination of India's Bene Israel community. Rather than being the last word on the subject, it's a light overview.

The camera pans on synagogue exteriors and interiors, cemeteries and gauzy landscapes. In a stream-of-conscience style, the narrator describes the ways in which the Bene Israel have absorbed Hindu sartorial, culinary and religious customs. The focus of the film, Shamash's aunt, leaves us with the claim that the Bene Israel have never experienced anti-Semitism in India.

Unpromised Land (May 7), a revisionist documentary from Israel, is the sad tale of a colony of Yemenite Jews whose dream was rudely shattered.

In 1912, Rabbi David Ben-Israel Tze'iri led his flock to the shores of the Sea of Galilee. There, in an inhospitable place, they drained swamps, cleared rocks, tilled the soil and built shelters.

Within two years of their arrival, they were displaced by East European Jewish settlers who founded Kibbutz Kinneret. By way of compensation, the Yemenites were allotted land in Rehovot. They adapted to their new surroundings, internalizing their shared pain. But they never really forgot the injustice inflicted upon them.

In Ayelet Heller's affecting movie, their descendants express bewilderment and anguish as they visit an old Yemenite cemetery near Kibbutz Kinneret where their ancestors are buried.

In the interests of balance, she lets the descendants of the kibbutz settlers voice their views. Some dismiss the Yemenites' grief as exaggerated, while others sympathize. The value of Unpromised Land is that it uncovers a long-suppressed episode of Israel's early modern history.

Rhodes Forever (May 7) glances backward at an island once inhabited by a vibrant Jewish community. Diane Perelsztejn's lovingly-assembled film, consisting of archival footage and talking heads, traces the community's development and demise.

Rhodes, settled by Sephardi Jews fleeing the Spanish Inquisition, was wrested from the Ottoman Empire by Italy in 1912. Five thousand Jews lived on Rhodes during that period. Worsening economic conditions forced many Jews to emigrate. Invariably, their destination was the Belgian Congo (Zaire).

From 1936 onward, anti-Semitic racial laws further reduced the size of the community. When the German army occupied Rhodes in 1944, only 1,700 Jews remained. They were deported to Auschwitz. Few survived.

Rhodes Forever, however, is not only a litany of woe. The social customs, culinary traditions and Ladino musical legacy of the island's Jews are explored at length. This documentary is bathed in a nostalgic aura.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

The Jewish Frankenstein: Born of superstition and Kabbalah, the fabled golem has been stalking the Jewish imagination for millenia, not mere centuries. The earliest literary references to this Jewish monster occur in the Bible (Psalms 139:16), Talmud and Sefer Yezirah or Book of Creation.

In recent times, we associate the legend of the golem with an actual historical figure, Judah Loew of Prague, who supposedly fashioned the golem from clay and gave it life through a mystical incantation. Although the famous rabbi of the Altneuschul synagogue lived in medieval times, the legend was pinned onto his gabardine cloak only in the last century, having been previously connected to Rabbi Elijah of Chelm.

The 1915 novel The Golem by Bavarian writer Gustave Meyrink presents "haunting shadowy suggestions of marvels and horrors just beyond reach ... and describes with singular mastery [Prague's] ancient ghetto with its spectral, peaked gables," wrote H.P. Lovecraft in his study Supernatural Horror in Literature.

The Golem

It was Meyrink who provided the basis for the weird, expressionistic imagery of Paul Wegener's and Carl Boese's 1920 silent film classic The Golem (Germany, 90 minutes), which is being screened with original live musical accompaniment as part of the upcoming Toronto Jewish Film Festival (May 2 to May 9).

The film, with its frenzied crowd scenes, supernatural elements and skewed architectural backdrops, fits in neatly with the traditions of German cinematic expressionism. Yet it also carries a subliminal message relating specifically to eastern European Jewish culture.

The film relates the tale of the learned Rabbi Loew – magician, astrologer and kabbalist who foresees that the Jews will need protection from evil forces and so creates a giant clay model of a man as protector. However, the golem soon runs amok, sets fire to the Jewish ghetto, knocks down a locked door and leaves the Jewish enclave.

The moment of highest tension comes when the golem sees some children playing and picks up a young girl. What will the monster do to her? The fate of the entire population of the ghetto is in his hands. Until the child is rescued, we experience a horrendous vertigo that also, subliminally, has to do with the end of Jewish segregation in Christian society and the approach of modernity.

This is the oldest film being shown at this year's festival. To accompany it, avant-garde guitarist Gary Lucas plays an original contemporary score on electric steel-string guitar. He has played the composition for numerous screenings throughout Europe.

The Golem is paced for the silent era; what breathes life into it is the powerful imagery. At the Bloor Cinema, May 5, 8.15 p.m. For tickets or a festival pass, phone 416-324-8600; fax 416-324-8668; or e-mail tjff@interlog.com.

Audience mesmerized by Anne Frank story

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Not a sound, only the odd nervous cough was heard as hundreds of young children, and some adults, were mesmerized at the first performance of The Diary of Anne Frank, celebrating the 30th anniversay season at Young Peoples Theatre (YPT). It runs until May 18.

This was an obvious tribute to the story of the 13-year-old Jewish girl who frolicked on stage, kicked up her heels and shouted "I want to have fun."

It was easy to identify with a curious, mischievous teenager cooped up in a secret hiding place for two years who yearned for the outside world. "Whenever I want to talk to my mother about life she asks if I'm constipated," said a frustrated Anne.

Not that Leah Cherniak's direction of a fine professional cast of 10 overlooked the underlying tragedy which Anne symbolized. The three-tier set was further extended by the use of black-and-white slides of Holocaust scenes, commenting silently on the events.

The Diary of Anne Frank by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett is a powerful drama and its value as a teaching tool is underlined by the excellent study guide for teachers prepared by the YPT. It is comprehensive with a detailed chronology.

The play's program notes are intriguing on this point too. "Imagine if you could post a letter to the secret annex in Amsterdam where Anne Frank is writing her famous diary. What would you say to her?" the notes ask. "In the play Anne tells us how much she missed riding her bicycle, listening to the radio and playing with her friends. What would you miss most if you had to hide away with your family for two years?"

The play runs until May 18 with performances at 7:30 p.m. Thursday and Friday and at 2 p.m. on the weekends. All seats are $20. 416-862-2222.

Business Briefs

Knesset Approves Pay Equity

JERUSALEM – As a result of legislation just passed by the Knesset, many Israeli women will receive the same salaries and benefits as men.

The Equal Pay For Equal Work law mandates that men and women who work for the same employer at the same place of work are entitled to equal salaries for similar or equivalent work.

According to recent surveys, the salary differential between men and women in Israel is rising steadily.

Bank Hapoalim Profits Rise

TEL AVIV – Bank Hapoalim has reported a continued increase in profitability showing the highest net profit ever reported by a company in Israel.

According to Rafi Ben-Ami, chief representative for the bank in Canada, net profits in 1995 reached $214.4 million (US), an increase of 17.1 percent over 1994. Additional profits of $12.4 million resulting from surplus investments of the bank were not included due to government decision and changes in legislation.

Net return on equity grew to 10.9 percent, up from 10.1 percent in 1994.

El Al Must Lower Prices

JERUSALEM – El Al will be forced to lower its prices to the Far East if it wants to compete with Royal Jordanian, tourism industry sources said recently.

Following Royal Jordanian's announcement that it would undercut El Al's prices to the Far East by about $300 (US), El Al replied that it would not lower its prices.

If it were to take any tactical steps at all, El Al would only lower prices for Christian pilgrim groups travelling to the United States.

"Let's face it, our fares to New York are already pretty cheap, and Royal Jordanian can't match our capacity and frequency," said El Al spokesperson Nachman Klieman.

But tourism industry sources said they believe Royal Jordanian's prices will eventually force El Al into a long overdue price war.

"Tickets from Amsterdam to the Far East cost $450, while tickets from Tel Aviv cost $1,250," said a spokesperson from Geographical Tours, which organizes trips abroad for Israelis. "The price war is good; the competition will allow more people to travel abroad."

Royal Jordanian's lowest fare to Bangkok is $650 and the round trip fare from Ben-Gurion Airport to Amman is $120. To encourage Israelis to visit Jordan and use the country's services, Jordan recently decided to lower the price of visas for Israelis from NIS 160 to NIS 70, the Transportation Ministry announced.

Klieman said the cheaper flights might attract Israeli backpackers, but a special deal El Al offers them – a year-long ticket on which they can fly to one Far Eastern destination and return from another – would help deter Israeli defection to the Jordanian carrier.

FTA Signed With Czech Republic And Slovakia

JERUSALEM – Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish will sign free trade agreements with the Czech Republic and Slovakia in May, the ministry said last week.

The two agreements, which will go into effect Jan. 1, 1997, represent Israel's first free trade agreement with any central European country.

According to the agreement, there will be an immediate exemption of certain taxes on some of the goods Israel imports from the two countries.

Two-way trade between Israel and the Czech Republic and Slovakia totals $100 million (US), but officials say potential for trade to develop exists.

Last year, Israel's exports there increased 25 percent to $40 million.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

A Bird In The Hand: In Eilat, Israel, by the side of a road, two sparrows are flitting in a mesh cage, fitted externally with loops of wire. The contraption is a trap that has already caught the attention of its intended victim, a steppe buzzard in a nearby tree. In a parked jeep about 100 yards away, Dr. Reuven Yosef and I are waiting for the buzzard to swoop.

For a few long minutes, the nervous sparrows are the only things that move.

"How is it the buzzard can see the sparrows but not the wire cage?" I ask.

"That's just how their brain works," says the acclaimed ornithologist. "By the same token, you can look through this dusty windshield, yet you don't see the glass."

He backs up the jeep in case we are spooking the bird. A minute later it dives and its talons are caught. Yosef guns forward to the trap and jumps out. In an instant he carefully untangles and takes hold of the buzzard's sharp talons. Then, raptor in hand, he hops back into the vehicle.

He is holding a magnificent, tawny, golden-eyed buzzard about a foot in height. Like the multitudes of winged creatures that travel along this migratory route between Africa and Europe in the spring and fall, this bird has likely flown 3,000 kilometres in the last three or four days. It has likely crossed the Sahara desert from central Africa, then descended upon the first bit of green it saw here in Eilat, only to get caught in Yosef's clever trap.

In a thatch banding hut surrounded by a handful of curious onlookers, Yosef – director of the International Ornithological Centre in Eilat – takes samples of the buzzard's blood, puts a band around one of its legs, then sets it free. Similar treatment awaits many smaller birds caught daily in superfine, almost invisible nets spread across the trees. Microscopic blood parasites, each particular to a given region of Africa, tell avian specialists exactly where the bird has been during the winter.

Besides being a prime sun and sand destination, the Red Sea port of Eilat is acknowledged as one of the world's foremost spots for birdwatching. The birds come in March and April and again in September and October; so do the birdwatchers, some 20,000 from all over the world. With their cameras and tripods, they may be seen in town, by the beach, along the three manmade lagoons and in a nature preserve and kibbutz within walking and biking distance of Eilat's famous hotels.

Early morning is the best time to visit the banding hut, which is near the Jordanian border. Many visitors rent bicycles from their hotels (often quite cheaply) and come to watch the World Wildlife Fund-sponsored ornithological team study and release the birds.

Dr. Reuven Yosef poses with a buzzard. [Bill Gladstone photo]

Nature lovers can easily spend a week or more here, observing the birds, the marine wildlife in the Red Sea's famous coral reefs and the desert fauna and flora of the Negev. Local guides sometimes take nature groups to small hidden springs where desert animals from goats to gazelles come to drink before dawn.

Some guides lead excursions into the Negev lasting two or three days or more. Noteworthy sites in the region include Timna Park, where the ancient Egyptians mined copper, and Solomon's Pillars, a spectacular natural rock formation with the ruins of an ancient Egyptian temple nearby.

For information on Eilat, contact the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto. 416- 964-3784 or 800-669-2369.

Our home is a sanctuary to the Almighty

Judaism is a faith not confined to synagogues. A Jew's home is his or her sanctuary.

The sanctity of the Jewish home is symbolized by the mezuzah, the scroll affixed at the doorpost of every Jewish home and of every room inside. It is a reminder to all who enter and leave that this is a Jewish dwelling devoted to the ideals of Judaism. It is also a symbol of G-d's watchful care over the dwelling and its inhabitants. It reminds everyone about to enter: This home is a sanctuary to the Almighty.

What does the mezuzah contain? It includes two biblical passages in which mention is made of this Divine commandment: Shema and Vehaya (Deuteronomy 6:4-9 and 11:13-21).

Shema declares the unity of the one G-d and our sacred, eternal duty to serve Him and only Him, and never to forsake our faithfulness to Him. Vehaya expresses G-d's assurance to us of the compensation that will follow our observance of the Torah's precepts.

Both passages contain the Commandment (mitzvah): "And thou shalt write them upon the doorposts of thy house and upon thy gates."

Thus, it is already "the doorpost" of the Jewish house that testifies to the effect that this is an entrance to a place where the unity of G-d is being proclaimed by every phase of daily life taking place within its walls.

The mezuzah is not affixed only on doors of private houses; it has to be affixed also "upon thy gates." The affixing of the mezuzah on gates leading to communal places, even on gates of cities, symbolizes the sovereignty of the Divine commandments — as outlined in Shema — over all aspects of Jewish, social and communal life.

Laws concerning the mezuzah

On the other hand, a mezuzah placed at the entrance gate of a town would not exempt individuals from affixing mezuzahs on their doors of their homes. The Jewish community is healthy and wholesome only if composed of wholesome individuals and families.

A few of the laws concerning the mezuzah:

No additions should be made to the text of the mezuzah.

Every place set aside for human activity of any kind, (with certain exceptions) requires a mezuzah at its entrance. However, to be considered as such, the place has to be surrounded by four walls, covered at least at the first four square cubits near the entrance. The doorposts have to be at least 10 spans high and there has to be a lintel between them.

Not just on the front door

A mezuzah must be affixed not only at the front door, but also at other doors in the home. A place serving regularly for unclean use (i.e. bathroom) is exempt.

Outside the Holy Land, the duty of affixing a mezuzah in a rented apartment begins on the 30th day after moving into such a place.

The mezuzah is folded so that Shema — which is on the right-hand side of the written page — should be on top, with the writing inside, starting from left to right.

Before being placed, the mezuzah is put in a cover made of glass, wood, metal or another material. Paper may be used, but then care should be taken that the paper in which the mezuzah is wrapped should be longer than the mezuzah itself, so that nails cannot pierce the mezuzah scroll when it is affixed to the door.

The mezuzah is placed on the doorpost at the right-hand side as you enter.

The affixing of the mezuzah is the duty of the tenant. However, when moving to another location, mezuzahs should not be taken away, unless the new tenant is a non-Jew.

Particular attention should be paid to buying the mezuzah from a dependable store, in order to be sure that it is handwritten in the proper way by a duly qualified scribe (sofer). A benediction said when affixing a possul (unfit for use), mezuzah is a Brocho Levatolo (a benediction pronounced in vain). It is customary to put the right hand on the mezuzah and kiss it both on entering and on leaving the house.

Doctor makes case for physician-assisted suicide

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Medical technology and palliative care cannot guarantee terminally ill people pain-free and dignified deaths, a physician specializing in the treatment of AIDS recently told his audience.

Dr. Philip Berger, chief of family medicine at Wellesley hospital, presented a case for the legalization of physician-assisted suicice (PAS) in a panel discussion on Assisted Suicide: Crime or Compassion, sponsored by the Young Professional Network of the United Jewish Appeal at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Toronto Hospital medical intensive care unit co-director Neil Lazar, a strong advocate for upholding the current law, argued that decriminalization could eventually lead to abuse. Global TV medical specialist Coleen Walsh moderated the discussion.

Berger said most people would not exercise the option, but PAS would give dying people security because they're anxious about experiencing uncontrolled pain. Although it's illegal, PAS is going on secretly in many parts of the country, he said.

Intellectually, Berger said he is a strong proponent of PAS, but he himself could not participate in a suicide. "My heart and my mind are not in the same place ... My heart holds respect for life."

To strengthen the case for PAS, he recounted several case histories of AIDS patients who died without dignity and in pain.

One was a woman who, at the end stage of the disease, died in agony because of a technological error. She was receiving continuous injections for pain, through a computerized pocket pump which malfunctioned, giving her only one percent of the prescribed dosage, and "she went screaming to her death with pain," he said.

Many dying people also experience tremendous psychological pain brought on by their encounter with "the existential end of life," Berger said. AIDS patients' bodies become skeletal and deformed by skin tumors, he said.

"Dignity is too loosely applied to people dying of AIDS. Death is a frenzied death ... Medicine can only soften the edges."

Lazar stressed that assisted suicide is a crime, even if it is carried out by a physician as an act of compassion. According to recent surveys conducted by the Canadian Medical Association, requests for PAS are rare occurrences — once every five years — he reported.

Most doctors are reluctant to participate in PAS because ending a patient's life does not fit the traditional patient-physician relationship, he said.

In Holland where PAS is practised, there are strict guidelines. It is not legal, but it is not prosecuted. As a result, some elderly people are afraid to enter into a health care relationship with physicians who engage in PAS, Lazar said.

He said people can exercise control by advance care planning. They can write down what kind of treatment they'd be prepared to accept. He conceded that pain is not always controllable by medication, particularly mental pain, which cannot be measured.

Admistering medication for pain relief can bring on an early death, Lazar noted. "It is reasonable and ethical to provide as much medication as possible to control a patient's pain, but it could hasten the end of their life."

Acknowledging this "inherent contradiction," he admitted that in such a situation the lines between palliative care and PAS are blurred. But he added that the difference is the amount of medication given: gradual increases in medications "relieve suffering," while sudden large increases "are given to end a patient's life," he said.

Lazar predicted that PAS will eventually become legalized. "We're moving toward a change in Canadian law. Public opinion is strongly in favor of PAS being legalized."

Childhood depression a serious illness, says book

By CHRISTINE STUTZ
Baltimore Jewish Times

BALTIMORE – Only 25 years ago, childhood depression was identified as a general psychiatric disorder. Today, it is considered a separate diagnostic category.

It is now estimated that between five and 10 percent of children suffer from some type of depression.

Dr. Leon Cytryn, a Baltimore resident, was one of the first physicians in the United States to recognize and study depression among the very young. In his book Growing Up Sad, published recently by W.W. Norton, he explores the causes and treatment of this serious mental illness, which can lead to suicide.

Cytryn, who spent part of his own childhood in Nazi concentration camps, is donating all royalties from the book to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

A modest, gentle man approaching the age of 70, the Polish-born Cytryn downplays the link between his tragic losses in the Holocaust – several hundred relatives were killed, he said, including his mother and sister – and his compassion for the mentally ill.

"I'm more sensitive to people's suffering," said Cytryn, who co-authored Growing Up Sad with Dr. Donald McKnew.

In occasional consultation with his wife, psychologist Eileen Cytryn, he still treats children and adults suffering from depression. A clinical professor of pediatrics and psychiatry at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., he maintains a home in Silver Spring, Md., and an apartment in Baltimore.

In his book, Cytryn wrote that he first noticed childhood depression in the late 1950s among his young surgical patients at Children's Hospital in Washington.

In his later studies of chronically ill children, he found symptoms of anxiety and/or depression in about half of them and began the work of convincing the psychiatric establishment to have childhood depression recognized as a separate category.

One important result of the groundbreaking work of Cytryn and others was that it forced the medical community to consider seriously the mental health of children when making policy.

In a foreword to the book, Dr. Jerry Wiener, chair of the Department of Psychiatry and Behavioral Sciences at the George Washington University School of Medicine, noted that as a result of research into childhood depression, many hospitals relaxed their visitation policies for pediatric patients to encourage family togetherness.

Depression in children is usually identified by a combination of symptoms, including feelings of despair, helplessness and hopelessness; disturbances in sleep and/or eating; impairment of performance in school; loss of interest in socializing; weight loss; and loss of energy.

Once dismissed as little more than a passing phase, childhood depression often is triggered by a traumatic event, such as separation from a close relative, and tends to recur periodically. If untreated, Cytryn said, the depression is likely to worsen in adolescence and adulthood. Childhood depression is frequently overlooked because youngsters hide it so well, he said.

A child with a depressed parent has a 25 to 30 percent chance of developing the condition, according to Cytryn. When both parents are depressed, that risk rises to 70 percent.

The good news, though, is that many effective treatments are now available and new scientific breakthroughs are being made all the time.

In helping children grow up secure and emotionally healthy, nothing can replace basic nurturing, said Cytryn.

Israel finishes 7th in IIHF hockey tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's national hockey team registered a disappointing seventh place finish in an International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) tournament in Lithuania recently, but still managed to avoid relegation from future Pool D play.

Stymied by short preparation time, inopportune injuries and the team's disqualification from three games for using ineligible players, the Israelis managed only a win and a tie in the six-game tournament. The disqualification in three games (officially recorded as 5-0 losses) cost the Israelis a tie versus Bulgaria. They lost the other two games for which they were disqualified.

Oded Orgil, a Toronto-based defenceman who joined the team, said the Israelis forfeited three games for using players who had not obtained the proper transfer cards required by IIHF rules. One player was originally from Kazakhstan and the other two were from Russia. All had lived in Israel the required three years.

One of them, Oleg Zak, had come to North America last summer to try out with the Detroit Falcons of the Colonial Hockey League and later with a team in the North American Hockey League.

When he didn't catch on he returned to Russia and later joined a Finnish pro team, obtaining a Russian transfer card. Because Israel was not mentioned on his transfer card to Finland, he was declared ineligible.

In addition to forfeiting the IIHF Pool D games, Israel was disqualified from a pre-tournament Olympic-qualifying game, which it had lost 5-3 to Yugoslavia anyway.

Despite the poor showing, Israel originally was not even supposed to participate in the IIHF event at all. It had lost to Greece in a qualifying tournament early in the year in Metulla, but Greece was disqualified for using ineligible players.

As a result Israel got into the IIHF tournament through the backdoor, but was only informed of that turn of events about four weeks before the event.

Eight skaters who play in Canada joined the Israelis for the tournament. In addition to Orgil, Sergie Gudzik, Yevgeni Feldman, Dan Mizrahi, Jonathan Yarkoni, Adam Flikerski, Shawn Frydberg and Mark Joseph laced up their skates for Israel.

The eight ringers arrived in Lithuania only hours before the first game, the Olympic-qualifier against Yugoslavia. They barely had time to check into their hotel and eat a meal before they hit the ice for the warm-up.

Playing jet-lagged and with three Israelis sitting out one-game suspensions for altercations earlier in Metulla (two of them defencemen), Israel squandered a 3-2 second period lead. They gave up the tying goal early in the third and then the fatigue factor set in. Yugoslavia took the lead at about the 10-minute mark and scored a few minutes later to ice it, winning 5-3.

"We played with four D from the start and we had no legs at the end," Orgil said.

That 5-3 result was later erased and became a 5-0 disqualification score.

In Game 1 of the IIHF Pool D tournament against Bulgaria, Israel took a 3-2 lead but a fluke goal that bounced in past partially screened netminder Yevgeni Gusin tied it 3-3 for the Bulgarians. Gusin was later named the tournament's top goaltender.

Israel lost the tie when they were disqualified later in the tournament and the official result was a 5-0 loss.

In Game 2, Israeli played the host Lithuanians in Elektrenai. Before a crowd of about 4,000 and with the game on TV, Israel held the high-powered Lithuanians to a 0-0 first period score.

But then defencemen Ran Oz and Sasha Stolyar and forward Oleg Agapov were injured and Joseph was ejected for yelling at the referee. Israel fell behind by a 4-1 second period margin and Lithuania poured it on in the third, winning 7-2. That game turned out to be Israel's last disqualification and again is recorded as a 5-0 loss.

By Game 3 versus Belgium, Israel learned of the disqualification and had to sit out the three players. Coupled with Oz's and Agapov's injuries, Israel was outmanned and lost 5-0 on the scoreboard.

In the consolation round, Israel played South Korea in what Orgil called an evenly-matched game. Israel kept up with the quick-skating East Asians and led at one point 3-2. The final was 3-3, despite Israel playing with only 12 skaters (two were benched).

Their last game pitted them against Australia, who had defeated Israel 5-1 last year. This time, Israel turned the tables and hammered them 8-2, a score that was indicative of the play, Orgil said. Gudzik netted two and Mizrahi, a centre who played for Concordia University in his college days, potted three goals. Feldman had one.

The team was coached by Nikolaj Epstein, who resides in Russia. Orgil said it is expected that Sergei Martin, a veteran on the team and an assistant coach, will be named head coach while Lev Genin, the team's third-string goalie, will become general manager.

Next up for the Israelis is a qualification match for next September's European club championships. The Jerusalem Lions, Israel's top club team, will likely play a team from either Greece or Turkey and the winner goes on to the 32-team event. Last year's champion was from Denmark, led by former NHLer Petri Skriko, Orgil said.

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY... DERBY RICE

HERB CAPLAN SELLS KitchenAid FOR LESS
1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

2 tblsp onion, minced	1/2 lb mushrooms
1/2 cup margarine	1/2 cup sliced almonds
2 cups rice	1/4 cup chopped parsley
4 1/2 cups chicken stock	salt, pepper

Sauté minced onion in margarine until it is softened. Add rice and stir until it is well coated with margarine. Add chicken stock and bring to boil. Simmer for 20-25 mins. or till liquid is absorbed. Chop mushrooms finely and sauté in 2 tblsp margarine. Toast almonds. When rice is cooked, toss with mushrooms, almonds and parsley. Season with salt and pepper. Serves 6-8.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I've heard it's possible to find jobs on the Internet. How does this work?

Dear Reader,

Finding jobs on the Internet takes a bit of time but can result in a position that will fit you to a T. If you've surfed the Net, you know how much information you are able to access with the flick of a wrist. If you've never before been on the Net, try it. Ask a friend to lead you through the steps to get on line or get a book to teach yourself. Many jobs can be found on the Internet and they encompass a wide variety of fields.

The most popular place to find in-depth job descriptions and lots of job postings are Internet job sites. These can be found by using a search engine and typing in key words like "Employment" or "Jobs" or "Career." Try using Yahoo [http://www.yahoo.com] or Open Text [http://www.opentext.com].

Some sites offer job search tips and job opening information. Try Canadian Job Source [http://www.irus.rri.uwo.ca], Net Jobs [http://www.netjobs.com] and Career Magazine Jobline Database [http://www.careermag.com/careermag/news/index.html].

All offer the opportunity to apply for each position by e-mail or uploading a resume directly to the company with the vacancy. A fee may be charged for some services.

Some university career centre's have developed their own web pages with links advertising job vacancies. An example of this is McGill University's Engineering Summer Employment Program [http://www.eus.mcgill.ca/mesep/homepage/html].

Jobs on the Net can also be placed by professional associations. One example is the Canadian Anaesthesia Job Registry [http://asaes.stjosephs.london.on.ca/canjob/html].

Job postings can also be found linked to company web pages or on home pages of recruiting companies.

One more area to search is a newsgroup. In Toronto try tor.jobs, in Ottawa try ott.jobs or if you are looking across Canada try can.jobs. Job newsgroups are most often maintained by employment agencies but corporations sometimes place ads there as well. One caution with newsgroups: Don't post your entire resume because you don't know who will read it. Instead, put only your availability, a contact address and perhaps a line or two about yourself.

Searching for work on the Internet can be rewarding but expect to spend at least two hours searching for useful information.

Nevertheless, since less than 10 per cent of Canadian adults know how to use the Internet, you can significantly cut down on the competition. Best of luck!

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.
